PREFACE.

According to the desire expressed on his death-bed by Mr. Pitt, the papers which he left were in the first instance delivered to his early friend, Dr. Tomline, Bishop of Lincoln. After the decease of the Bishop and of the last Lord Chatham, these MSS. devolved to my cousin, William Stanhope Taylor, Esq., grand-nephew of Mr. Pitt. When Mr. Taylor also died, the papers came into the possession of another grand-nephew of Mr. Pitt through his younger sister—Colonel John Pringle, who has in the kindest manner and without the smallest reserve placed them in my hands.

The Bishop of Lincoln, in his examination of these MSS., and in pursuance of the discretion assigned him, appears to have destroyed nearly all the letters addressed to Mr. Pitt by members of Mr. Pitt's family. Among those that now remain in the collection there is not one from his mother, from either of his sisters, or from either of his brothers, until the time when his eldest brother became his Cabinet colleague. The letters addressed to him by the Bishop himself, and by several other personal friends, have also been removed.

On the other hand, there still exists the series of letters which Mr. Pitt wrote to his mother. These from the first she appears to have carefully preserved, and they were, I presume, returned to him after her death. A few blanks in the series may, indeed, here and there be traced, and some accident appears to have befallen the concluding portion. Since October, 1799, only one letter to Lady Chatham is left, bearing the date of January 5, 1802, besides another of September 17 following, to her companion, Mrs. Stapleton. There are also very confidential letters addressed by Mr. Pitt to his brother, Lord Chatham, though some are missing from the series, and though none among them bears an earlier date than 1794. Of these letters, both to his mother and his brother, which will be wholly new to the public, I have inserted the greater portion in my narrative.

I have also largely availed myself of the series of MS. letters addressed to Mr. Pitt by King George the Third. This is, I believe, quite complete, although on the other hand there are now preserved very few drafts of Mr. Pitt's own communications to the King.

There are in this collection many letters from Mr. Pitt's colleagues and other men of note in politics; and also drafts or copies, although not equally numerous, of his letters to them.

In 1842 my much valued friend the late Duke of Rutland entrusted to me, in the original MSS., the correspondence between his father and Mr. Pitt, and gave me leave to put it into type. The copies, of which the number was fixed at one hundred, were confined to a circle of friends; but I had the Duke's sanction to insert some considerable extracts in the 'Quarterly Review,' No. 140, and in my own collected Essays.

In 1849 I had an opportunity, through the kindness of the late Lord Melville, to examine the papers at Melville Castle, and to take several transcripts. No letter from Mr. Pitt of an earlier date than 1794 is, so far as I saw, there preserved. In 1852 I obtained permission from the present Lord Melville to print for private circulation the most important of these papers in a small volume, which I entitled 'Secret Correspondence connected with Mr. Pitt's Return to Office in 1804.'

I may observe that the letters of Mr. Pitt to his friend before the peerage begin 'Dear Dundas,' while on the other side it is always 'My dear Sir.'

I have also obtained some communications of considerable value through the kindness of the Duke of Bedford, of Lord St. Germans, of Mr. Dundas of Arniston, and of other gentlemen, to whom my warm thanks are due; and I need scarcely advert to the great interest and importance of several published collections, more especially the Malmesbury, the Buckingham, and the Cornwallis Papers, and the biographies of Lord Sidmouth and Mr. Wilberforce.

PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION.

In my small volume of 'Miscellanies' (the Second Edition of which appeared in 1863) will be found various additional Letters from Mr. Pitt—as to the Duke of Rutland, the Earl of Harrowby, and Sir Walter Farquhar—many of which did not come into my hands until after my account of his Life was completed and published. I have not attempted to embody these Letters with my present edition, first, because they are none of them essential to the narrative; and secondly, because in regard to books of large compass I think it unjust to the purchasers of the earlier copies to make any important changes in the later, except only in correction, if need be, of proved and admitted errors.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

CHAPTER I.

1754–1780.

Birth of William Pitt—Early signs of great promise—Feeble health in boyhood—Education—At seventeen admitted M.A. at Cambridge—Study of Elocution—Death of his father—Economical habits—Entered at Lincoln's Inn—Attends Parliamentary debates—Introduction to Fox—Called to the Bar—Joins the Western Circuit—M.P. for Appleby.

WILLIAM PITT the elder, best known by his subsequent title as Earl of Chatham, married in 1754 Lady Hester Grenville, only daughter of Hester, in her own right Countess Temple. William Pitt, their second son, was born on the 28th of May, 1759, at Hayes, near Bromley, in Kent.

The house and grounds of Hayes, which had been purchased by Lord Chatham, were disposed of by his eldest son some years after his decease. So far as can be judged at present, the house has been but little altered since his time. The best bedroom is still pointed out as the apartment in which William Pitt was born; it is most probably also the apartment in which his father died.

Besides William, Lord and Lady Chatham had two sons and two daughters. John, the eldest son, was born in 1756, and James Charles, the youngest, in 1761. The daughters were Hester, born in 1755, and Harriot, born in 1758. Lord Chatham designed his eldest son for the army, and his third for the navy, while the second, who had early given signs of great promise, was reserved for the Bar.

The year 1759, in which William Pitt was born, was perhaps the most glorious and eventful in his father's life. The impulse given to the war by that great orator and statesman was apparent in unexampled victories achieved in every quarter of the globe. In Germany we gained the battle of Minden, in North America we gained the battle of Quebec. In Africa we reduced Goree, and in the West Indies Guadaloupe. In the East we beat back the son of the Emperor of Delhi and the chiefs of the Dutch at Chinsura. Off the coast of Brittany we prevailed in the great naval conflict of Quiberon; off the coast of Portugal in the great naval conflict of Lagos. 'Indeed,'—so Horace Walpole at the close of this year complains in a letter to Sir Horace Mann—'one is forced to ask every morning what victory there is, for fear of missing one.'

But years rolled on, and fortune changed. In 1761 Mr. Pitt on a difference with his colleagues resigned the Seals. The King on this occasion bestowed on him a pension of 3,000*l.* a year for three lives, and raised Lady Hester to the peerage in her own right as Baroness Chatham.

In the summer of 1765 the retired statesman went with his family to reside at Burton Pynsent, an estate of 3,000*l.* a year in Somersetshire, which had been most unexpectedly bequeathed to him by an entire stranger, Sir William Pynsent.

On a sudden in July, 1766, Mr. Pitt was called back to office, it may be said almost unanimously, by the public voice. But by a grievous error of his own, he determined to leave the House of Commons. He accepted together with the Privy Seal the title of Earl of Chatham.

At this period his two elder sons, and his daughter Hester, were residing at Weymouth for the benefit of their health, under the charge of their tutor, the Rev. Edward Wilson. That gentleman reports little William as 'perfectly happy' in retaining his father's name. Three months before he had said to his tutor in a very serious conversation, and in reference, as it must then have been, to his mother's peerage, 'I am glad I am not the eldest son; I want to speak in the House of Commons like Papa.'[1]

There is another story, which belongs to almost the same period, but which is of more doubtful authenticity, as depending only on distant recollection. Lord Holland tells us that the Duchess of Leinster once related to him a conversation, at which she was present, between her sister, the first Lady Holland, and her husband, Lord Holland. The lady, in remonstrating with the gentleman on his excessive indulgence to all his children, and to Charles Fox in particular, added, 'I have been this morning with Lady Hester Pitt (Lady Chatham), and there is little William Pitt, not eight years old, and really the cleverest child I ever saw; and brought up so strictly and so proper in his behaviour, that, mark my words, that little boy will be a thorn in Charles's side as long as he lives.'[2]

As the 'little boy' grew up, he evinced to all around him many other tokens of his genius and ambition. In April, 1772, during a few days' absence, we find Lady Chatham write as follows to her husband:—'The fineness of William's mind makes him enjoy with the highest pleasure what would be above the reach of any other creature of his small age. The young Lieutenant may not perhaps go quite so deep.'[1] This young Lieutenant was Lord Pitt, the eldest son, whom William, though three years the junior, had already on all points excelled.

To the same effect there is other not more discriminating, but more disinterested testimony. In the summer of 1773 the two brothers had gone with Mr. Wilson for the sake of sea-bathing to Lyme. There Hayley the poet became well acquainted with them. In his Memoirs he describes William Pitt as 'now a wonderful boy of fourteen, who eclipsed his brother in conversation.' And he adds:—'Hayley often reflected on the singular pleasure he had derived from his young acquaintance; regretting, however, that his reserve had prevented his imparting to the wonderful youth the epic poem he had begun.'[2] The very youngest critic that ever perhaps any poet chose!

But at this period William Pitt had himself become a poet. He had written a tragedy in five acts, and in blank verse, entitled 'Laurentius, King of Clarinium.' We learn by a note of Lady Chatham that it was represented for the first time at Burton Pynsent, August 22, 1772, and it was acted again in the spring of the ensuing year. There is a prologue, which was 'spoken by Mr. Pitt,' and of which a copy is signed in his own hand. All the parts were sustained by the five brothers and sisters, and the spectators were only their parents, with Lord and Lady Stanhope, and a very few other family friends. The manuscript of this play is still preserved at Chevening. I showed it to Lord Macaulay in one of the country visits—alas! too soon concluded—which I had the great pleasure to receive from him; and Lord Macaulay speaks of it as follows in his excellent biographical sketch of Mr. Pitt, the last of all his published compositions:—'The tragedy is bad of course, but not worse than the tragedies of Hayley. It is in some respects highly curious. There is no love. The whole plot is political; and it is remarkable that the interest, such as it is, turns on a contest about a Regency. On one side is a faithful servant of the Crown; on the other an ambitious and unprincipled conspirator. At length the King, who had been missing, re-appears, resumes his power, and rewards the faithful defender of his rights. A reader who should judge only by internal evidence, would have no hesitation in pronouncing that the play was written by some Pittite poetaster, at the time of the rejoicings for the recovery of George the Third, in 1789.'

But while Lord and Lady Chatham watched with no common pleasure the intellectual promise of their second son, they were frequently distressed by his delicate health. 'My poor William is still ailing:' such is the constant burthen of his father's letters during his boyhood. There were great fears that so frail a plant would never be reared to full maturity.

It was no doubt on account of his feeble health in boyhood that little William was not sent to any public or private school. He was brought up at home by the tuition of Mr. Wilson, and under his father's eye. Lord Chatham was indeed most careful of the education of his family. Bishop Tomline assures us that 'when his Lordship's health would permit, he never suffered a day to pass without giving instruction of some sort to his children; and seldom without reading a chapter of the Bible with them.'[1]

Under Mr. Wilson, William Pitt studied the classics in Greek and Latin, and the elements of Mathematics. In spite of the frequent interruptions from ill-health he made most rapid progress. He had so peculiar a discrimination in seizing at once the meaning of an author, that as Mr. Wilson once observed, he never seemed to learn, but only to recollect. At fourteen he was as forward as most lads at seventeen or eighteen, and was considered already ripe for college.

[1] Life of Pitt, vol. i. p. 5.

Without any disparagement to Mr. Wilson, it was certainly from Lord Chatham that young William profited most. Lord Chatham was an affectionate father to all his children. He took pleasure, as we have seen, in teaching them all. But he discerned—as who would not?—the rare abilities of William, and applied himself to unfold them with a never-failing care. From an early age he was wont to select any piece of eloquence he met with and transmit it to his son. Of this I have seen a striking instance in a note from him to Lady Chatham, which is indorsed in pencil 'Ma. 1770,' and which was thought to have no literary value. It was kindly presented to me in answer to my request for autographs to oblige some collectors among my friends; and it was designed to be cut up into two or three pieces of handwriting. But I found the note conclude with these words, 'I send Domitian as a specimen of oratory for William.' Now, 'Domitian' was one of the subsidiary signatures of the author of 'Junius,' and the letter in question seems to be that of March 5, 1770.[1] The words of Lord Chatham prove what has sometimes been disputed, that the eloquence of the author of 'Junius' was noticed and admired by the best judges, even when his compositions were concealed under another name.

In the same spirit Lord Chatham used to recommend to his son the best books as models. Thus he bid him read 'Barrow's Sermons,' which he thought admirably calculated to furnish the copia verborum. Thus again he enjoined upon him the earnest study of the greatest Greek historians. Bishop Tomline says, 'It was by Lord Chatham's particular desire that Thucydides was the first Greek book which Mr. Pitt read after he came to college. The only other wish ever expressed by his Lordship relative to Mr. Pitt's studies was, that I would read Polybius with him.'

But I have yet to notice what for Lord Chatham's

object was his main plan of all. In 1803, my father, then Lord Mahon, had the high privilege, as a relative, of being for several weeks an inmate of Mr. Pitt's house at Walmer Castle. Presuming on that familiar intercourse, he told me that he ventured on one occasion to ask Mr. Pitt by what means he had acquired his admirable readiness of speech—his aptness of finding the right word without pause or hesitation. Mr. Pitt replied that whatever readiness he might be thought to possess in that respect was, he believed, greatly owing to a practice which his father had impressed upon him. Lord Chatham had bid him take up any book in some foreign language with which he was well acquainted, in Latin or Greek especially. Lord Chatham then enjoined him to read out of this work a passage in English, stopping, where he was not sure of the word to be used in English, until the right word came to his mind, and then proceed. Mr. Pitt stated that he had assiduously followed this practice. We may conclude that at first he had often to stop for awhile before he could recollect the proper word, but that he found the difficulties gradually disappear, until what was a toil to him at first became at last an easy and familiar task.[1]

To an orator the charm of voice is of very far more importance than mere readers of speeches would find it easy to believe. I have known some speakers in whom that one advantage seemed almost to supply the place of every other. The tones of William Pitt were by nature sonorous and clear; and the further art how to manage and modulate his voice to the best advantage was instilled into him by his father with exquisite skill. Lord Chatham himself was pre-eminent in that art, as also in the graces of action, insomuch that these accomplishments have been sometimes imputed to him as a fault. In a passage of Horace Walpole, written with the manifest desire to disparage him, we find him compared to Garrick.[1]

To train his son in sonorous elocution, Lord Chatham caused him to recite day by day in his presence passages from the best English poets. The two poets most commonly selected for this purpose were Shakespeare and Milton, and Mr. Pitt continued through life familiar with both. There is another fact which Lord Macaulay has recorded from tradition, and which I also remember to have heard:—'The debate in Pandemonium was, as it well deserved to be, one of his favourite passages; and his early friends used to talk, long after his death, of the just emphasis and the melodious cadence with which they had heard him recite the incomparable speech of Belial.'

Being at fourteen so forward in his studies, William Pitt was sent to the University of Cambridge. He was entered at Pembroke Hall in the spring of 1773, and commenced his residence in October the same year. Mr. Wilson, in the first instance, attended him to Cambridge, and resided with him for some weeks in the same apartments, but solely for the care of his health, and without any concern in the direction of his studies. He had been commended to the especial care of the Rev. George Pretyman, one of the two tutors of his college; and it was not long ere that gentleman became both his sole instructor and his familiar friend.

George Pretyman, whom I have already cited and called by anticipation Bishop Tomline, was born at Bury St Edmunds in 1750. Proceeding to Cambridge he showed not indeed any brilliant ability, but a keen and unflinching application. He made himself an excellent mathematician, as well as an excellent scholar, and in 1772 he was the Senior Wrangler for the year. I shall have occasion to show how in after life the friendship of Mr. Pitt as Minister raised him to high honours in the [1] Memoirs of George II., vol. i. p. 479.

Church, and above all to the Bishopric of Lincoln. In 1803 he assumed the name of Tomline, on the bequest of a large estate. He was translated to the See of Winchester in 1820, and he died in 1827.

It was Bishop Tomline to whom, as we shall see, Mr. Pitt bequeathed his papers for examination. Some years later the Bishop evinced his attachment to the memory of his pupil and his patron by undertaking the Memoirs of his Life. This work he did not live to finish. The first part, which was published in 1821, and which now lies before me, in three octavo volumes, extends only to the close of 1792. Great expectations had been formed on the appearance of this work. I am certainly not going beyond the truth if I say that such expectations of it were much disappointed. It does indeed impart to us an authentic and important though rather meagre account of Pitt in his earlier years. It does indeed contain some, though very few, extracts from his private correspondence. But nearly the whole remainder of this biography is a mere compilation. It gives us for the most part Pitt's measures from the 'Annual Register,' and his speeches from the Parliamentary debates. It was composed, as an Edinburgh reviewer said at the time, not by the aid of his Lordship's pen, but rather 'by his Lordship's sharp and faithful scissors!'[1]

At Cambridge William Pitt was still intent on his main object of oratorical excellence. Immediately after his arrival we find him attend a course of lectures on Quintilian.[2] But his health at this period gave cause for great alarm. From a boy he had shot up far too rapidly to a tall, lank stripling, with no corresponding development of breadth and muscle. In the first few weeks of his college-life he was seized with a most serious illness. For nearly two months he was confined to his rooms, and reduced to so weak a state that upon his convalescence he was four days in travelling to London.

Returning under such unfavourable circumstances, his father kept him at home for half a year. During this interval he was placed under the care of the family physician, Dr. Addington. This gentleman recommended early hours, with exercise every day on horseback, and a careful system of diet. But he further prescribed liberal potations of port-wine. It was a remedy which certainly accorded well with the young man's constitution. He took it at this time with manifest advantage, and he adhered to it through life. It was his elixir of strength amidst all his toils and cares, but perhaps in the long run with no good effect. While it must frequently have recruited his energies, it may be suspected of combining with these toils and cares to undermine his constitution.

Alarming as it seemed at the time, the illness of Pitt in the autumn of 1773 proved in truth the turning point of his disorder. By attention to Dr. Addington's rules he much more than recovered his lost ground. In July, 1774, some weeks before the commencement of the autumn term, he was permitted to return to Cambridge—'the evacuated seat of the Muses,' as Lord Chatham calls it in his somewhat affected epistolary style.[1] William Pitt renewed at once his study of Quintilian and Thucydides, but did not pursue that study by night. 'The Historic Muse,' thus he writes to his father, 'captivates extremely, but at the same time I beg you to be persuaded that neither she nor any of her sisters allure me from the resolution of early hours, which has been steadfastly adhered to, and makes the academic life agree perfectly.'[2] Nor did he at this time neglect his daily ride nor yet his daily draughts of port-wine. He had no relapse nor material check, and by slow but sure degrees gained strength. 'At the age of eighteen,' says his tutor, 'he was a healthy man, and he continued so for many years.'

In December, 1774, the family circle of Mr. Pitt was agreeably extended. His eldest sister, Lady Hester, became the wife of Charles Lord Mahon. There was already some relationship, since the first Earl Stanhope had married Miss Lucy Pitt, an aunt of Lord Chatham. But besides this tie of kindred the two families had for many years past been on terms of most friendly intercourse; and in public life Lord Stanhope was one of the few remaining followers of Lord Chatham. The 'Great Earl' was on this account much pleased at the alliance, and also as having formed a most favourable opinion of his future son-in-law. In an unpublished letter of this period, dated November 28, 1774, addressed to Mr. James Grenville, he describes Lord Mahon as follows:—

'Though the outside is well, it is by looking within that invaluable treasures appear; a head to contrive, a heart to conceive, and a hand to execute whatever is good, lovely, and of fair repute. He is as yet very new to our vile world, indeed quite a traveller in England. I grieve that he has no seat in Parliament, that wickedest and best school for superior natures.'

Lord Mahon had been educated at Geneva, where he imbibed an ardent zeal both for liberty and science. Between him and William Pitt there now grew up a warm feeling of friendship. Lord Mahon was about six years the elder, but in their intercourse this difference might be compensated by the superiority of talent in William. Under Lord Chatham's guidance the two young men looked forward to the same course in politics, and there seemed every probability that the confidence between them would through life continue unimpaired.

In the spring of 1776, and at the age of seventeen, Mr. Pitt was admitted to the Degree of Master of Arts at Cambridge, without any examination, according to the unwise privilege which was still at that time conceded to the sons of Peers. His tutor tells us that 'while Mr. Pitt was an undergraduate he never omitted attending chapel morning and evening, or dining in the public hall, except when prevented by indisposition. Nor did he pass a single evening out of the college walls. Indeed most of his time was spent with me.'[1]

On taking his degree Mr. Pitt did not, according to the common practice, take his leave of college. On the contrary, he continued to live for the most part as before at Pembroke Hall until near the period when he came of age. Thus his whole residence at the University was protracted, although with considerable intervals of absence, to the unusual length of almost seven years. 'In the course of this time,' adds his tutor, 'I never knew him spend an idle day, nor did he ever fail to attend me at the appointed hour.'

It was during these graduate years at Pembroke Hall that Mr. Pitt laid in his principal stores of knowledge. They were in many branches very considerable. In mathematics, the especial pride of Cambridge, he took great delight. He frequently alluded in later life to the practical advantage which he had derived from them, and declared that no portion of his time had been more usefully employed than that which he devoted to this study. He was master of everything usually known by the academic 'wranglers,' and felt a great desire—but Mr. Pretyman did not think it right to indulge the inclination—to fathom still farther the depths of pure mathematics. 'When,' adds Mr. Pretyman,' 'the connection of tutor and pupil was about to cease between us, he expressed a hope that he should find leisure and opportunity to read Newton's "Principia" again with me after some summer circuit.'

The general rule of Mr. Pretyman was to read with his pupil alternately classics and mathematics. In the former as in the latter the knowledge of Pitt became both extensive and profound. He had never, indeed, according to the fashion at public schools, applied himself to Greek or Latin composition. He had never mastered the laborious inutilities of the ancient metres. But as to the true and vivifying aim of classic study —the accurate and critical comprehension of the classic authors—he was certainly in the first rank. There was scarce a Greek or a Latin writer of any eminence among the classics the whole of whose works Pitt and Pretyman did not read together. The future statesman was a nice observer of their different styles, and alive to all their various excellences. So anxious was he not to leave even a single Greek poet unexplored, that at his request Mr. Pretyman went through with him the obscure rhapsody of Lycophron. 'This,' says his preceptor, 'he read with an ease at first sight, which, if I had not witnessed it, I should have thought beyond the compass of human intellect.'

How well amidst all the cares of office Pitt retained through life his classic knowledge is shown among several other testimonies by one which Lord John Russell has recorded. Lord Harrowby said that, being with Mr. Pitt at his country-house, he and Lord Grenville were one day waiting for Mr. Pitt in his library: they opened a Thucydides, and came to a passage which they could not make out. They continued to puzzle at it till Mr. Pitt, coming in, took the volume and construed the passage with the greatest ease.[1]

Of the modern languages, French was the only one that Pitt acquired. Once and once only in his life, as we shall find, he passed a few weeks in France. During this excursion and before it he applied himself to the language of the country, which he learnt both to speak and write with ease. In its literature also he was by no means unversed. My father told me that he had been present at an animated argument between Lord Grenville and Mr. Pitt on the merits of Molière.

[1] Memorials and Correspondence of Fox, by Lord John Russell, vol. ii. p. 3. I have myself heard Lord Harrowby relate the same story, with this addition, that the two gentlemen were waiting to join Mr. Pitt in an afternoon ride, and that Mr. Pitt, coming into the room ready to go out, translated the passage in a moment, hat in hand.

Besides his primary studies in mathematics and in ancient languages Pitt gave great attention to the public lectures in Civil Law, of which he felt the importance as bearing on his future profession. He also attended the lectures upon experimental philosophy, to which he was incited by the zealous example of his relative at Chevening, and in which, as is said, he took great pleasure.

Of the English books which he read at Cambridge there was none, as Mr. Pretyman records, which gave Pitt greater satisfaction than 'Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding.' He drew up for himself a complete and correct analysis of that important work. We may further conclude, from the early zeal with which he espoused the principles of Adam Smith in the House of Commons, that even at the University he had been an assiduous reader of the 'Wealth of Nations.'

Pitt—so Mr. Pretyman tells us—was not an admirer of Dr. Johnson's style, and still less of Gibbon's. As writers he much preferred Robertson and Hume. He was fond of Middleton's 'Life of Cicero,' and fonder still of Lord Bolingbroke's political works. These last had no doubt been earnestly commended to him by Lord Chatham; for in a letter at an earlier period addressed to Thomas Pitt we find Lord Chatham praise them in the highest terms. Of one of them, namely, the 'Remarks on the History of England,' published under the name of Sir John Oldcastle, he says that they are 'to be studied and almost got by heart for the inimitable beauty of the style.'[1] Pitt appears to have retained through life an equal admiration of them. At Walmer

[1] To Thomas Pitt, May 4, 1754.

Castle my father heard him more than once declare that there was no loss in literature which he more lamented than that scarce any trace remained to us of Bolingbroke's Parliamentary speeches.

But whatever the studies of Pitt, whether in the ancient languages or in his own, the aim of public speaking was kept steadily in view. He continued with Mr. Pretyman the same practice of extemporaneous translation which with his father he had commenced. We further learn from his preceptor that 'when alone he dwelt for hours upon striking passages of an orator or historian, in noticing their turn of expression, and marking their manner of arranging a narrative. A few pages sometimes occupied a whole morning. It was a favourite employment with him to compare opposite speeches upon the same subject, and to observe how each speaker managed his own side of the question. The authors whom he preferred for this purpose were Livy, Thucydides, and Sallust. Upon these occasions his observations were not unfrequently committed to paper, and furnished a topic for conversation with me at our next meeting. He was also in the habit of copying any eloquent sentence or any beautiful or forcible expression which occurred in his reading.'

We have seen that as an undergraduate Mr. Pitt made few acquaintance, and went into no society. It is probable that at fourteen and fifteen his fellow-collegians might regard him as a boy. But after taking his degree at the age of seventeen he began to mix freely with other young men of his own age at Cambridge. There he laid the foundations of several of the future friendships of his life. His manners at this time are described as gentle and unassuming, and free from all taint of self-conceit. Those who in after years confronted night by night in the House of Commons the haughty and resolute Prime Minister, armed on all points, and ever self-possessed, had great difficulty in believing how far in his social hours he could unbend.

Yet the testimony as follows of Mr. Pretyman at Cambridge will be found confirmed by several others a little later, but to the same effect:—'He was always the most lively person in company, abounding in playful wit and quick repartee; but never known to excite pain, or to give just ground of offence.'

'But though'—thus Mr. Pretyman proceeds to say—'his society was universally sought, and from the age of seventeen or eighteen he constantly passed his evenings in company, he steadily avoided every species of irregularity.' This remark of his preceptor is by no means to be limited to his college years. Then and ever afterwards the strictness of his morals was maintained. Indeed throughout his life it became for want of a better the favourite taunt of his opponents. Whoever looks through the Whig satires or epigrams of that day which proceeded from the wits at Brooks's—some of them remarkable for their talent and spirit—will be surprised at the number of sarcasms on that account aimed in various forms at the 'immaculate young Minister.' To be of an amorous temper is there assumed as among the most essential qualifications of a statesman!

The residence of Pitt at Cambridge was varied by occasional trips to London; above all, when Lord Chatham brought forward any important motion in the House of Lords. Thus in January, 1775, we find him report as follows on the next day after the debate to Lady Chatham:—

> I can now tell you correctly: my father has slept well, without any burning in the feet or restlessness. He has had no pain, but is lame in one ankle near the instep, from standing so long. No wonder he is lame; his first speech lasted above an hour, and the second half an hour—surely the two finest speeches that ever were made before, unless by himself! He will be with you to dinner at four o'clock.[1]

There are also on record two letters to his mother,

[1] See the Chatham Correspondence, vol. iv. p. 377.

giving a full report of the great debate, which in like manner he attended in May, 1777.[1]

But chief of all was the scene on the memorable 7th of April, 1778, on the final, and as it has been called the dying, speech of Lord Chatham. His eldest son and also his youngest were at this time absent on foreign service. It devolved on William conjointly with Lord Mahon to support between them their venerable parent, as with feeble steps but no faltering spirit he tottered in through the assembled Peers, and raised for the last time his eloquent voice in his country's cause. Need I again relate what I have elsewhere told —how on rising to reply he fell back in convulsions— how his son and son-in-law, aided by the Peers around him, bore him forth to a private chamber—how he was removed to Hayes—and how on the 11th of May following the great orator and statesman died?

At the death of Lord Chatham all parties, seemingly at least, combined to do him honour. The House of Commons granted 20,000*l.* for the payment of his debts. An Act of Parliament passed, annexing an annuity of 4,000*l.* for ever to his Earldom. A public funeral and a monument to his memory were unanimously voted.

The public funeral took place in Westminster Abbey on Tuesday the 9th of June. William Pitt, in the absence of his elder brother, walked as the chief mourner, supported on one side by Lord Mahon, and on the other by Thomas Pitt of Boconnoc, the head of the Pitt family. Late the same afternoon we find him write as follows from Lord Mahon's house in Harley Street to Lady Chatham, who had remained at Hayes :—

Harley Street, June 9, 1778.

My Dear Mother,—I cannot let the servants return without letting you know that the sad solemnity has been celebrated so as to answer every important wish we could form on the subject. The Court did not honour us with their countenance, nor did they suffer the procession to be as magnificent as it ought; but it had notwithstanding everything essential to the great object, the attendance being most respectable, and the crowd of interested spectators immense. The Duke of Gloucester was in the Abbey. Lord Rockingham, the Duke of Northumberland, and all the minority in town were present. The pall-bearers were Sir G. Savile, Mr. Townshend, Dunning, and Burke. The eight assistant mourners were Lord Abingdon, Lord Cholmondeley, Lord Harcourt, Lord Effingham, Lord Townshend, Lord Fortescue, Lord Shelburne, and Lord Camden. All our relations made their appearance. You will excuse my not sending you a more particular account, as I think of being at Hayes to-morrow morning. I will not tell you what I felt on this occasion, to which no words are equal; but I know that you will have a satisfaction in hearing that Lord Mahon as well as myself supported the trial perfectly well, and have not at all suffered from the fatigue. The procession did not separate till four o'clock. Lady Mahon continues much better, and has had no return of her complaint.

I hope the additional melancholy of the day will not have been too overcoming for you, and that I shall have the comfort of finding you pretty well to-morrow. I shall be able to give you an account of what is thought as to our going to Court. And I am ever, my dear Mother, your most dutiful and affectionate son, W. PITT.

Shortly afterwards William Pitt accompanied his mother and sister Harriot to Burton Pynsent, where he remained with them during the summer and autumn months. But in October we find him again at Pembroke Hall.

At this time there occurred a transaction chiefly remarkable as the first that brought Mr. Pitt into public notice. Some communications had passed at the beginning of the year between Sir James Wright, a friend of Lord Bute, and Dr. Addington, the friend and physician of Lord Chatham. Acting without authority, they had sought to bring the two statesmen into concert with each other. But after Lord Chatham's death their gossiping interviews gave rise to a bitter controversy. Lord Mountstuart, eldest son of Lord Bute, taking part in this, addressed a letter to the newspapers on the 23rd of October. The second Lord Chatham was still on foreign service, so that the duty of reply devolved on William Pitt. Accordingly he published a letter dated Harley Street, October 29th, going fully through the documents adduced, and showing that his father, so far from courting, had without hesitation rejected every idea of a political union with Lord Bute.[1]

The state of his father's fortune, as bearing on his own, must here also be referred to. Lord Chatham had been himself a younger son of small patrimony. In public life he had been most disinterested. In private life he had been a little unthrifty. Notwithstanding the unexpected bequest of Burton Pynsent, he was, as we have seen, much embarrassed when he died. William Pitt therefore found it requisite even from his early years to practise strict economy. When in 1773 he began his college-life, he was most amply cared for on every point of study or of health. In other respects he received but a scanty supply. One of his first calculations at Cambridge was how most cheaply—whether on meadow or in stable—he could keep his horse.[2]

At the death of his father economy became more than ever requisite for William. The generosity of Parliament did indeed enable his eldest brother to maintain—and no more than maintain—the family honours. His mother also was in comfortable circumstances, from the receipt of the pension of 3,000*l.* granted in 1761 for three lives; although, as appears from many passages in the Pitt Correspondence, she was often distressed by the non-payment of arrears.

[1] All the papers on this no longer interesting subject will be found in the Annual Register for 1778, pp. 244-264. For a fuller account of it I venture to refer to my History of England, vol. vi. p. 321.

[2] See his Letter in the Chatham Papers, vol. iv. p. 355.

But William himself could only look forward, on coming of age, to an income of between 250*l.* and 300*l.* a year. Meanwhile, whether at Cambridge or in London, he does not appear to have received any fixed allowance. He was wont to write home from time to time, naming the moderate sum which the payment of his bills and his other late expenses would require.

Under such circumstances as to fortune there arose for Pitt the question of the purchase of chambers at Lincoln's Inn; and on that subject we find him write to Lady Chatham as follows:—

Pembroke Hall, Nov. 30, 1778.

My Dear Mother,— . . . .
I am much obliged to you for thinking of my finances, which are in no urgent want of repair; but if I should happen to buy a horse they will be soon; and therefore, if it is not inconvenient to you, I shall be much obliged to you for a draft of 50*l.*, which I think will be sufficient for the current expenses of this quarter.

Another object presents itself, which would require a more considerable sum, and which I wish to submit to your consideration. It will very soon be necessary for me to have rooms at Lincoln's Inn, and upon the whole I am persuaded the best economy in the end would be to purchase, though I do not know what means there may be of advancing the sum necessary for that purpose. While I was in town I saw a set which are to be disposed of, and which have no other fault than being too dear and too good. At the same time I heard of none at an inferior price, which were not as much too bad. The whole expense of these will be eleven hundred pounds, which sounds to me a frightful sum, although I know that if I do not sink so much out of my capital, the annual diminution of my income (if I was to hire) would amount to near the interest of that sum. The rooms are in an exceeding good situation in the new buildings, and will be perfectly fit for habitation in about two months. Soon after that time it will be right for me to begin attending Westminster Hall during that term, and these chambers will be more convenient than any other residence. If I should take these, the sum to be paid immediately is somewhat more than three hundred, and the remaining eight about next Easter. I have done no more than to secure that they may not be engaged to any other person till I have returned an answer, and I shall be glad to know your opinion as soon as possible. You will be so good as to consider how far you approve of the idea, if it be practicable, and whether there are any means of advancing the money out of my fortune before I am of age. If in either light you see any objection to the scheme, I shall without any difficulty lay it aside, and shall probably at any time hereafter, when it becomes convenient, be able to suit myself without much trouble, as there will always be rooms vacant. If, however, you approve of it, I should be rather inclined to embrace this opportunity. Ever, my dear Mother, &c., W. PITT.

The purchase of the chambers in question was happily effected. It appears that Earl Temple, Lady Chatham's eldest brother, supplied the money required, as an advance upon the fortune to which his nephew would be entitled when he came of age. But it is certainly striking to find the future Prime Minister, destined in a few years more to dispense in his country's service tens of millions of pounds sterling, speak of eleven hundred as 'a frightful sum.'

Being duly entered at Lincoln's Inn, Pitt began to keep his terms. These involved only occasional visits, of a few days each, to London. But the young lawyer eagerly availed himself of such opportunities to attend any remarkable debate that might take place in Parliament. It is said that on one of these occasions he was introduced, on the steps of the throne in the House of Lords, to Mr. Fox, who was his senior by ten years, and already in the fulness of his fame. Fox used afterwards to relate that, as the discussion proceeded, Pitt repeatedly turned to him and said, 'But surely, Mr. Fox, that might be met thus:' or, 'Yes, but he lays himself open to retort.' What the particular criticisms were, Fox had forgotten; but he said that he was much struck at the time by the precocity of a lad who through the whole sitting was thinking only how all the speeches on both sides could be answered.[1]

Hotel, King Street, Feb. 11, 1779.

My Dear Mother,—I flatter myself that a letter from me may not be unwelcome, though it cannot have the merit of much news to recommend it, neither of a public nor private sort. To begin with the second, which I believe pretty generally claims precedence, nothing has, I am afraid, yet been obtained on the subject of the arrears. I saw Mr. Coutts on Tuesday, who told me that Mr. Crauford had been ill, which had delayed the presenting of the memorial, but that he now expected to hear of its effect every day. I shall renew my inquiry in a short time, and wish I may receive a favourable account of the seven quarters. . . . . . .

I am to meet my sister at Hayes on the subject of your commission, as soon as she can find a leisure moment. Her great business is that of secretary to Lord Mahon, whose 'Electricity' is almost ready for the press, and will rank him, I suppose, with Dr. Franklin. I have just been dining with a brother philosopher of his, Dr. Priestley, at Shelburne House. His Lordship is very cordial in his enquiries after you; and if you continue in the West till next summer, 'will think it his duty to make them in person at Burton.' He is very obliging to me. . . .

You will have the goodness to excuse the haste of a letter written in my way to the Opera.

Ever, my dear Mother, &c., W. Pitt.

Nerot's Hotel, Thursday, Feb. 18, 1779.

At present I hope to set out Sunday or Monday; and nothing probably can tempt me to any delay except the prospect of an interesting debate, which, however, I do not foresee at present.

If it should happen, I will certainly write to you next post. I have been for two or three days an auditor at one or other of the Houses, but without any great entertainment.

[1] I give this Holland House tradition, which is no doubt quite authentic, in the very words of Lord Macaulay (Biographies, p. 147, ed. 1860).

To-day I had the honour of being squeezed with the Duke of Cumberland in the gallery of the House of Commons, and hearing the Speaker deliver the thanks to Admiral Keppel.

Nerot's Hotel, Wednesday night (1779).

I have heard no news of any kind. James is gone with my sisters to the ball as a professed dancer, which stands in the place of an invitation; a character which I do not assume, and have therefore stayed away.

Nerot's Hotel, Tuesday, Half-past Two (1779).

I was just going to mount my horse about an hour ago, when the most violent of all April showers prevented me, and by that means it is now so late that I have no chance of reaching Hayes by dinner. Consequently I must at all events give up the hope of enjoying much of your company this evening; which being the case, the double temptation of a seat in the gallery of the House of Commons, and a ticket for the Duchess of Bolton's in the evening, determined me to defer it till to-morrow morning.

Nothing less than the concurrence of all these circumstances could have been sufficient to alter my resolution of coming to you to-day; and even now I should be almost afraid that the engagement which called me from Hayes last night, and that which detains me here at present, might completely stamp me for a fine gentleman, if the House of Commons did not come in to support the gravity of my character. I shall certainly be with you to-morrow, at as early an hour as the raking of this evening will permit.

Nerot's Hotel, June 19, 1779.

You will easily imagine that the principal subject of conversation here is the Rescript which has been delivered within these few days from Spain; and that subject, I am sure, does not afford matter of agreeable consideration.

The situation of public affairs is undoubtedly in most respects rendered still more melancholy and deplorable by that event, and all the dangers that have for some time been apprehended are accelerated and increased.

There seems, however, to be less despondency than might be expected in such circumstances; and I am willing to flatter myself that it may, in the midst of many evils, be productive of some good effects at home, and that there may still be spirit and resources in the country sufficient to preserve at least the remnant of a great empire. I was very glad to be present at the debate on this subject in the House of Lords, which, though not so good in point of speaking as many I have heard, could not fail of being extremely interesting. My brother, as well as his friend the Duke of Rutland, took their seats on this occasion, and added two to a respectable minority. Lord Shelburne spoke as usual with great ability, and made the roughest invective I ever heard against several of the Ministry, Lord North in particular.

Pembroke Hall, June 28, 1779.

I left Lord and Lady Mahon and Harriot in town, not likely, I imagine, to quit it for some time. Unless the Parliament should continue sitting, they will probably have as solitary a vacation there, as I propose to myself here. This place has so many advantages for study, and I have unavoidably lost so much time lately, and can spare so little for the future, that I cannot help wishing to continue here a considerable part of the summer. It is, however, quite indifferent to me whether that part be at the beginning or end; and at all events, if there is any particular time at which you wish to see me at Burton, I shall always be in readiness to obey your summons immediately.

Pembroke Hall, July 3, 1779.

Within a short time the scenes of Cambridge are become doubly interesting to me, as I have lately found very good reason to hope that the University may furnish me with a seat in Parliament possibly at the General Election. It is a seat of all others the most desirable, as being free from expense, perfectly independent, and I think in every respect extremely honourable. You will not wonder that I am not indifferent to such an object, and my wishes on this occasion will, I trust, coincide with yours for me. You will perhaps think the idea hastily taken up, when I tell you that six candidates have declared already; but I assure you that I shall not flatter myself with any vain hopes, or stir a step without all the certainty which the nature of the case admits. Hitherto I have not pursued my inquiries far enough to form quite a confident opinion, and till I have, I shall keep the idea a perfect secret, which is indispensably necessary to its success. I may probably very soon be enabled to judge, and may be obliged to declare my intentions; but you shall undoubtedly hear as soon as possible the further progress of this business.

The design here communicated as a secret was soon afterwards publicly announced. Mr. Pitt wrote to several persons of weight and influence, asking their support. Amongst others we find him on the 19th of July address a letter to the Marquis of Rockingham, the chief, in name at least, of the Opposition at that time. But his Lordship was cold and ungracious. He left Mr. Pitt for upwards of a fortnight without any answer at all; and on the 7th of August he thus replied:—

I am so circumstanced from the knowledge I have of several persons who may be candidates, and who indeed are expected to be so, that it makes it impossible for me in this instance to show the attention to your wishes which your own as well as the great merits of your family entitle you to.[1]

In the same month of August Mr. Pitt wrote to Lady Chatham on a wholly different and still more interesting subject:—

Nerot's Hotel, King Street, Saturday, Aug. 21, 1779.

My Dear Mother,—The accounts which have been received within these few days of the French and Spanish fleets have brought the apprehension of danger nearer to our doors, and rendered the suspense on public affairs still more anxious than ever. While the idea prevailed, which it did for a little while, of a force actually landing at Plymouth, I was also more particularly solicitous, because your neighbourhood to that place, though not such as to expose you at all to anything immediately very serious, might, I feared, be productive of great inconvenience and distress. That report first reached me at Chevening, and I came to town immediately with the intention of setting out for Burton to-day, thinking that it might be more satisfaction to you, and feeling that it would be so to myself, to be near you at such a time. I find, however, to-day that it is understood that the enemy had retired from the coasts without attempting anything, and an engagement with Sir Charles Hardy seems to be the first event which people now expect. I do not learn that any official account has yet been received from him, but fresh intelligence is expected every moment. On the whole the present alarm seems subsided; and indeed the exterior of London has been, as far as I have seen, very little affected by the state. There has been none of the confusion, and hardly any of the signs of anxiety which might be expected at such a moment. I still, however, feel very impatient to see you, as, although I think you must have been out of the reach of any great alarm, I cannot help being somewhat anxious to be more fully assured of it. I shall therefore leave London to-morrow (as I had before intended), and probably make the best of my way to Burton, in which case I shall arrive before this letter. If, however, I should before that time find less reason to be in so much haste, I may perhaps contrive to take Stowe in my way.

It would seem, however, that this intended visit to Stowe did not take place. Lord Temple was at this time in declining health, and he expired on the following 11th of September. He was succeeded as second Earl by his nephew George, eldest son of George Grenville, the late Prime Minister. The new Peer, born in 1753, had for some years been one of the members for the county of Buckingham, in which representation he was now succeeded by his next brother, Thomas Grenville, who was born in 1755, and who survived till 1846. Their third brother, William Wyndham Grenville, afterwards Lord Grenville, was born in 1759. All three were of course first cousins of Mr. Pitt; and each will be found to play a part, more or less important, in my future narrative.

Having passed the autumn weeks with Lady Chat-

Pembroke Hall, Oct. 15, 1779.

I find everything going on admirably well relative to my object here, which I think it will be a satisfaction to you to know.

Nerot's Hotel, Nov. 23, 1779.

I cannot imagine that, according to any idea of law or right, any subsequent grant would affect anything but what might remain from the produce of the fund after yours should be discharged. Those therefore whose grants were later could have no right to be paid but out of the surplus after the payment to you, and their claims do not justify yours being in arrear. . . . . The pleas in your favour appear certainly so strong that it would be wrong to leave the matter as it stands at present, and I do not myself see how there can be any objections (in point of delicacy) to seeking redress by whatever is the proper method. Complaining of any abuses in the management of the fund cannot convey anything improper towards the Great Person from whom the grant originally came; and in any other light I do not conceive any reason for a moment's hesitation. Whatever you may resolve upon, I flatter myself that my brother or I being upon the spot there will be very little trouble in the detail.

Lincoln's Inn, Dec. 18, 1779.

My residence here is for the present very comfortable, and when everything is finished, of which at last there really seems to be a near prospect, will be as complete as a lawyer can aspire to. In that state I flatter myself I shall see it when I return hither after Christmas. I now think of going to Cambridge for a short time towards the end of next week, and shall indeed only wait for those means from you which are, I am sorry to say, necessary to enable me. I trust I need not say how unwilling I am to make any demands at so inconvenient a time, but the approach of Christmas, and the expense of moving, oblige me to beg you to supply me with a draft of 60*l*.

Pembroke Hall, Jan. 3, 1780.

My Dear Mother,—I was very unwillingly prevented last post-day from thanking you for your last letter, and sending you a proper certificate of my health, which I think it will be a satisfaction to you to receive. The charge of looking slender and thin when the doctor saw me I do not entirely deny; but if it was in a greater degree than usual, it may fairly be attributed to the hurry of London, and an accidental cold at the time. Both those causes have equally ceased on my removal hither, and as my way of life has ever since been as fattening as any one could desire, I believe I now possess as much embonpoint as I have naturally any right to. I had followed the doctor's advice by drinking asses' milk before I received your letter; and so easy a prescription I have no objection to obeying, though I believe it unnecessary, for some time longer. The use of the horse I assure you I do not neglect, in the properest medium; and a sufficient number of idle avocations secure me quite enough from the danger of too much study. On the whole, I think I may give in short a very satisfactory account of myself, as I really feel perfectly well, and yet do nothing that even an invalid need be afraid of. Among the principal occupations of Cambridge at this season of Christmas are perpetual college feasts, a species of exercise in which, above all others, I shall not forget your rule of moderation. The character, too, of candidate supplies me always with some employment, which, without deserving the name of business, fills up a good deal of time. . . . My business here is in a prosperous train, but nothing materially new is to be expected at present. The new year in some measure seems to promise a happy one to Ministry, if not to the country. It can hardly promise and keep its word to both. . . .

I am, my dear Mother, &c., W. Pitt.

Pembroke Hall, Jan. 12, 1780.

I do not know whether to hope that your western climate has been as much milder than ours as usual; for the weather we have had, though very sharp for above a fortnight, has been uncommonly pleasant, and such as I think you would enjoy. Within two or three days the frost has been too hard for riding, which is the only thing I quarrel with in it; and even that I can forgive, while it makes walking so excellent.

Your moor must be in the perfection of winter beauty; but I suppose with hardly any cattle upon it, except stalking horses.

The Cambridgeshire fens are nearly enough related to it to put me often in mind of it, though I confess the family likeness, with such a difference of features, is not much to the advantage of this country.

The counties in this part of the world are beginning to awaken, and most of them will, I hope, adopt the Yorkshire measures.[1] I do not yet hear anything to the honour of the West, which I am sorry for.

Lincoln's Inn, Feb. 9, 1780.

You will, I hope, have excused my trusting entirely to my more constant correspondent Harriot for your knowing that I was established in town. I have really been a good deal engaged, and in some measure necessarily, having begun to attend as a lawyer at Westminster Hall; to which I confess has also been added occasionally the less professional pursuit of Opera, Pantheon, &c., &c., so that my time between business and pleasure may be fully accounted for. I am now going to a scene where both are united, I mean the House of Lords, who are to enter to-day on the consideration of Lord Shelburne's motion. The pleasure of it would be a good deal heightened if there were any present prospect of its having any considerable effect. The ground is certainly very strong, and some accessions to the minority are expected; but I fear there is little chance of their being for some time numerous enough to turn it into a majority.

Grafton Street,[2] Feb. 26, 1780.

You will not, I believe, be sorry to hear that in the House of Commons yesterday, on a motion for the List of Pensions, which the Ministry strenuously opposed, the minority was 186 against 188. This, I think, looks like the downfall of those in power; and I am willing to hope that the views of Opposition are really such as would make that event a blessing for the country. The principles on which some persons at bottom probably act (I need not explain whom I mean) I have as little confidence in as any one, but I think they are so deeply pledged for what is right that no harm can be apprehended from them at present.

Lincoln's Inn, March 14, 1780.

My Parliamentary engagements still continue, and have now afforded me a scene which I never saw before, a majority against a Minister.[1] I was in the gallery till near three this morning, when this great phenomenon took place. The debate was the most interesting imaginable, and not the less so from Sir Fletcher Norton's unexpected and violent declarations against Lord North. What the consequence will be cannot be guessed, but I have no ideas of Ministry being able to stand. There are rumours of Parliament being to be dissolved soon after Easter, which oblige me to work double tides in the business of canvassing. My prospect, though not more certain, is as favourable as ever. Harriot will, I know, have sent Burke's speech, which I think will entertain you both with real beauties and ridiculous affectations. I have heard two less studied harangues from him since in reply, that please me much more than this does now that it is upon paper.

Grafton Street, April 4, 1780.

Last night was the masquerade, the pompous promises of which the newspapers must have carried to Burton. Harriot went with Lady Williams to Mrs. Weddel's (who is, I believe, a sister of Lady Rockingham's) to see masks. She was very much pleased with it, principally, I fancy, because it was the first thing of the kind she has seen. I was there as well as at a much more numerous assemblage at a magnificent Mr. Broadhead's, to which some few ladies did not like to go, from little histories relative to the lady of the house. These did not prevent its being the most crowded place I ever was in. The company I was not conversant enough in masks to judge of. I concluded my evening at the Pantheon, which I had never seen illuminated, and which is really a glorious scene. In other respects, as I had hardly the pleasure of plaguing or being plagued by any body, I was heartily tired of my domino before it was over.

Harley Street, April 20, 1780.

All my feelings with regard to the paper enclosed [1] I need not express. I am sure I should be far indeed from wishing to suggest a syllable of alteration. The language of the heart, of such a heart especially, can never require or admit of correction. May it remain as it deserves, a lasting monument of both the subject and the author. My pen does not easily go from this topic to that of common news, nor of that have I much to tell you. It is, however, an essential satisfaction to assure you that I find my sister Mahon mended greatly in looks and strength, and in all respects since I have been absent; more indeed than I could have flattered myself. If the weather should not be very unfavourable she will go with Harriot to-morrow to Hayes, and I hope return soon quite in established health. You will be glad too to hear that I have every reason to be satisfied with my visit to Cambridge, which gives me as promising an expectation as is possible in the circumstances. It seems not unlikely that there may be an election there even before the end of this Parliament.

With regard to the business of my account [2] there is certainly no occasion to have it re-stated. I am only sorry it has already occasioned you so much trouble, and still more so to think that your affairs are still so full of such embarrassment. I hope it will not be necessary to think of selling the arrears.

Lincoln's Inn, May 2, 1780.

I was yesterday present at a great debate in the House of Commons, where, according to the old custom, which is, I fear, pretty nearly re-established, arguments and numbers

[1] Lady Chatham had consulted her son on the inscription which she had drawn up for the pedestal of a marble urn to the memory of her husband in the grounds of Burton Pynsent. The inscription will be found printed at length in the Chatham Correspondence, vol. iv. p. 531.

When, after Lady Chatham's death, the estate of Burton Pynsent was sold, the urn, with its inscription, was transferred to the gardens at Stowe. Upon the dispersion of the family relics at that place the urn passed into a stranger's hands. But it has subsequently been recovered by another relative, James Banks Stanhope, Esq., M.P., who has raised the interesting monument once again in his gardens at Revesby Park, in Lincolnshire.

were almost equally clear on opposite sides. The idea of a Dissolution seems not to prevail so much as it did, which is indeed very natural.

Lincoln's Inn, June 1, 1780.

The London Courant will have given you, I believe, a pretty accurate account of what passed at Buckingham, which was not of a very pleasant kind. But it is a satisfaction that the person for whom we are the most interested had much the better in all respects. Lord Temple has been at Stowe since, so that we have none of us had an opportunity of meeting. These unfortunate divisions weaken if they do not extinguish all hope for the public.[1]

Lincoln's Inn, June 8, 1780.

The accounts which the papers will have given you of the religious mobs which have infested us for some days, will make you, I know, desirous to know in what state we now are. I have the satisfaction to tell you that from the appearance of to-night everything seems likely to subside, and we may sleep again as in a Christian country. Lincoln's Inn has been [surrounded] with flames on all sides, but itself perfectly free from danger.

The only objects of resentment seem to have been public characters and the residences of Roman Catholics or felons. None of those you are particularly interested for have been exposed to any inconvenience or apprehension, or anything else than the disagreeable and disgraceful sight which such uncontrolled licentiousness exhibits.

Lincoln's Inn, Thursday (June, 1780).

You should certainly have found me a better correspondent, but that my time has really been infinitely taken up. Besides the military transactions of the times, I have had to assume within these few days the pacific character of a barrister-at-law, and now want nothing but my wig and gown to qualify me for the Western Circuit. Lincoln's Inn has continued uninsulted during the whole of this scene. It was, however, thought necessary that we should show our readiness to defend ourselves. Accordingly several very respectable lawyers have appeared with muskets on their shoulders, to the no small diversion of all spectators. Unluckily the appearance of danger ended just as we embodied, and our military ardour has been thrown away.

Cambridge, July 7, 1780.

I heard yesterday from Lord Mahon on the subject of my canvass, who mentions that he and my sister were to remove from town in a day or two. I trust the country air will bring back her strength, and add to the progress of her recovery, which for some time has scarcely kept pace with our expectations.

We learn from Bishop Tomline that Mr. Pitt was called to the Bar on the 12th of June, 1780. But a family bereavement, though little foreseen, was now close impending. Lady Mahon, a sister to whom Mr. Pitt was tenderly attached, died at Chevening on the 18th of July. She was only twenty-five years of age, but her health had never completely rallied from the birth of her last child. She left three daughters: the first, her namesake, who, as Lady Hester Stanhope, will re-appear in the latter part of my narrative; secondly, Griselda, who in 1800 married John Tekell, Esq., and who died without issue in 1851; and, thirdly, Lucy, who in 1796 married Thomas Taylor, Esq., and who died in 1814, leaving three sons and four daughters. To this youngest niece, born in February, 1780, Mr. Pitt had been godfather.

In the course of the ensuing year Lord Mahon married again. The object of his choice was Louisa, only child of the Hon. Henry Grenville, who had filled in succession the posts of Governor of Barbadoes and Ambassador at Constantinople. He was a younger brother of Lady Chatham; so that as the first Lady Mahon was sister, the second was first cousin of Mr. Pitt. Of this second marriage were born three sons: first, my father, the fourth Earl Stanhope; secondly,

Charles Banks, a Major in the army, who was killed at the head of his regiment at the battle of Coruña; and, thirdly, James Hamilton, a Lieutenant-Colonel in the army, who married a daughter of the Earl of Mansfield, and who died in 1825.

In the August following, we find Mr. Pitt join for a short time the Western Circuit, and give a hasty report of his proceedings.

Dorchester, Aug. 4, 1780.

My Dear Mother,—You will be glad to have early information of my having arrived prosperously at this place, and taken upon me the character of a lawyer. I have indeed done so, yet no otherwise than by eating and drinking with lawyers; and so far I find the Circuit perfectly agreeable. I write this in the morning, lest I should not have time after. There is not, to be sure, much probability of my being overwhelmed with business, but I may possibly have my time filled up with hearing others for the remainder of the day; and, therefore, to show how much I profit by our last conversation, I make sure of the present moment. I could also give you another instance, for, thanks to the sun and an eastern aspect, I was burnt out of my bed this morning before seven o'clock. My gown and wig do not make their appearance till two or three hours hence, as great part of the morning is taken up by the Judges going to church, where it does not seem the etiquette for counsel to attend.

You will not suppose that I have much news to tell you. The only thing worth mentioning is a curious enclosure which came to me by last night's post in a cover franked 'Tho. Pitt.' Adieu. Your ever dutiful and affectionate son,

W. Pitt.

Exeter, Aug. 9, 1780.

My Dear Mother,—I have but just time to write one line to tell you that I received your packet yesterday. Having been in Court till now, I fear I am too late for the regular post. . . . I have not forgot the Bonds of Award, and will return them as soon as I can find time, but so much is employed either in the hall or at table that I have not much to dispose of. Lord Mahon's letter was to inquire after you, and to tell me that a Dissolution was expected very soon. It must be rather uncertain, but I shall not be surprised if an express overtakes me with the news. If it should, I shall take Burton flying in my way to Cambridge. Believe me, &c., W. PITT.

I shall leave this place on Saturday and proceed to Bodmin, unless summoned away by a Dissolution.

On the 1st of September accordingly the Parliament was dissolved. Pitt repaired in all haste to Cambridge, and an arduous contest began. But when it closed, he found himself at the bottom of the poll. He announced the result the same evening in a note as follows:—

Pembroke Hall, Sept. 16, 1780.

My Dear Mother,—Mansfield and Townshend have run away with the prize, but my struggle has not been dishonourable.

I am just going to Cheveley [1] for a day or two, and shall soon return to you for as long as the law will permit, which will now be probably the sole object with me. I hope you are all well. Your ever dutiful and affectionate

W. PITT.

Mr. Pitt appears to have paid his customary visit to Lady Chatham in the autumn; but on his return to town, his letters to her represent him as thoroughly immersed in the cares of his new profession.

Lincoln's Inn, Nov. 23, 1780.

I do not wonder that you seem to consider me rather as an idle correspondent, which, much against my will, I feel that I have been.

If I had been able to give you any information worth knowing of what passed in Parliament, I certainly would; but really there has been nothing decisive, and all seems to be put off till after Christmas. You will, I am sure, be ready to excuse a little either of ignorance or laziness, when I assure you that ever since Term began I have been almost every day in Westminster Hall the whole time between breakfast and dinner, and that the rest of the day is sufficiently taken up by necessary business and incidental avocations which are unavoidable.

At this very time, however, an opening to public life unexpectedly appeared. The brave and lamented Granby had been a friend and follower of Chatham. His eldest son, who was senior by five years to William Pitt, became one of the Members for the University of Cambridge, and in 1779 succeeded his grandfather as Duke of Rutland. Mindful of his hereditary friendships, he sought the acquaintance of William Pitt in the first years of Pitt at Cambridge. When Pitt came to live in London, the two young men quickly grew intimate, and the warm attachment between them was continued during the whole of the Duke's life.

It was natural, under such circumstances, that the Duke of Rutland should feel most sincere concern at the exclusion of Pitt from the House of Commons. He spoke upon the subject to Sir James Lowther, another ally of his house, and the owner of most extensive borough influence. Sir James quickly caught the idea, and proposed to avail himself of a double return for one of his boroughs to bring the friend of his friend into Parliament. The Duke mentioned the offer to Pitt; and Pitt, who was writing on the same day to his mother, added a few lines in haste to let her know. But it was not until after he had seen Sir James himself that he was able to express his entire satisfaction at the prospect now before him.

Lincoln's Inn, Thursday night, Nov., 1780.

My Dear Mother,—I can now inform you that I have seen Sir James Lowther, who has repeated to me the offer he had before made, and in the handsomest manner. Judging from my father's principles, he concludes that mine would be agreeable to his own, and on that ground—to me of all others the most agreeable—to bring me in. No kind of condition was mentioned, but that if ever our lines of conduct should become opposite, I should give him an opportunity of choosing another person. On such liberal terms I could certainly not hesitate to accept the proposal, than which nothing could be in any respect more agreeable. Appleby is the place I am to represent, and the election will be made (probably in a week or ten days) without my having any trouble, or even visiting my constituents. I shall be in time to be spectator and auditor at least of the important scene after the holidays. I would not defer confirming to you this intelligence, which I believe you will not be sorry to hear. I am, my dear Mother, &c., W. PITT.

Dec. 7, 1780.

I have not yet received the notification of my election. It will probably not take place till the end of this week, as Sir James Lowther was to settle an election at Haslemere before he went into the north, and meant to be present at Appleby afterwards. The Parliament adjourned yesterday, so I shall not take my seat till after the holidays. . . . I propose before long, in spite of politics, to make an excursion for a sort time to Lord Westmorland's[1] and shall probably look at my constituents that should have been at Cambridge, in my way. I have hopes of extending to Burton in the course of the Christmas recess.

But the pleasure of Pitt at his approaching entrance into Parliament was grievously dashed by another domestic calamity. The sudden news came that his youngest brother, James Charles, who was absent on service, and already a Post-Captain, had died in the West Indies. William set off immediately for Burton Pynsent, and from thence wrote as follows to Mr. Pretyman :—

You will, I know, be anxious to hear from me. I have to regret the loss of a brother who had everything that was most amiable and promising, everything that I could love and admire; and I feel the favourite hope of my mind extinguished by this untimely blow. Let me, however, assure you that I am too much tried in affliction not to be able to support myself under it; and that my poor mother and sister, to whom I brought the sad account yesterday, have not suffered in their health from so severe a shock. I have prevailed on them to think of changing the scene and moving towards Hayes, which is a great comfort to me, as the solitude and distance of this place must now be insupportable. I imagine that we shall begin our journey in a few days.[1]

1781-1782.

On the 23rd of January, 1781, when the Parliament met again, Mr. Pitt took his seat as member for Appleby. That date marks both the commencement and the close of his public life, for it was on the anniversary of the same day that he died.

At the time when Mr. Pitt first entered the House of Commons Lord North was still at the head of public affairs. Himself the most good-humoured and amiable of men, he might often as a Minister seem harsh, and still more often unfortunate. Yielding his own better judgment to the personal wishes of the King, he continued to maintain the fatal war against the revolted colonies, with a failing popularity and with a doubtful mind. His principal reliance at this time in debate was on Lord George Germaine, the Secretary of State, and on Henry Dundas, the Lord Advocate for Scotland.

The Opposition arrayed against him consisted, in fact, of two parties. They had been recently reconciled, and almost always voted together; yet still, as appeared shortly afterwards, the union between them was by no means thorough and complete. Of these two parties the largest by far in point of numbers was founded on the old Whig connection of the Great Houses, or, as they loved to call themselves, the 'Revolution Families.' Men of this stamp could seldom—as Horace Walpole once complained of the Duke of Portland—extend their views beyond the high wall of Burlington House. To them birth and rank seemed the principal qualities for leadership. In former years they had chafed at the ascendency of the elder Pitt; and now they could never look on Burke in any other light than as a toiling and useful subordinate, to be rewarded on occasion with some second-rate place, and not worthy to sit in council with a Wentworth or a Cavendish.

With such views they had for many years acknowledged as their leader the Marquis of Rockingham, head of the house of Wentworth, a nobleman of vast estates, of highly honourable character, but of very slender ability either for business or debate. But their leader in the Commons and the true impelling and guiding spirit of their whole party was Charles James Fox. Born in 1749, a younger son of the first Lord Holland, he had entered Parliament at only nineteen as member for the close borough of Midhurst. His youth had been marked by a course of wild extravagance and by the assertion of strong anti-popular politics. On two occasions he had held a subordinate office under Lord North. But soon breaking loose from these trammels and joining the ranks of Opposition, side by side with Burke, he had made himself most formidable to his recent chief. His admirable eloquence and his powers of debate—never exceeded in any age or in any nation—his generous and open temper, and the warm attachment, which ensued from it, of his political friends, cast into the shade his irregular life and his ruined fortunes, and extorted the wonder even of his enemies. Under him at this time were two men whose genius would have made them capable of leading, but who were proud to serve under so great a chief. There was Edmund Burke, the first philosophical statesman of his country; there was Richard Brinsley Sheridan, the first of her dramatists in recent times, who had already produced some masterpieces of wit upon the stage, and was shortly to produce other masterpieces of oratory in the House of Commons.

Besides this main body of the old Whig aristocracy, there was also in Opposition a smaller band of the old adherents of Lord Chatham. It comprised the Earl of Shelburne and Lord Camden, who had filled the offices of Secretary of State and Chancellor in Chatham's last administration, and who to the close of his life had enjoyed his highest confidence. Lord Shelburne was indeed looked upon as the leader of his party since his death. There were also among its chief men Mr. Thomas Townshend, an active and useful politician, who spoke often and not without effect; Mr. Dunning, unrivalled in his own time for success at the Bar; and Colonel Barré, a bold and unsparing, and therefore the more applauded debater.

It was almost as a matter of course that Mr. Pitt on entering Parliament attached himself closely to this party. So had his eldest brother on coming of age. So had his friend the Duke of Rutland, on succeeding to the title. So had also his kinsman Lord Mahon, who had been returned at the general election for the borough of High Wycombe, then a close corporation under the control of Lord Shelburne. So had also Mr. John Jeffreys Pratt, the only son of Lord Camden, and born in the same year as Mr. Pitt, who had come in for another close corporation, that of Bath.

But besides these, as I may term them, hereditary ties, Mr. Pitt began at this time to form some intimate friendships with other young men, chiefly, like himself, entering upon life, and more or less closely linked with him in politics. Such were Henry Bankes, of Corfe Castle in Dorsetshire, whom he had known well at Cambridge; Edward, the eldest son of Mr. Eliot, of Port Eliot, in Cornwall, who some years later became his brother-in-law; Richard Pepper Arden, afterwards Lord Alvanley; Robert Smith, at this time member for Nottingham, and head of a great banking-house in London. Unlike the rest, he was seven years the senior of Pitt, and yet he survived him thirty-two.

But, of all the intimacies formed at this time by Mr. Pitt, there was none that ripened into more cordial friendship than that with Mr. Wilberforce. The son of a banker at Hull, and the owner of a good estate in Yorkshire, William Wilberforce, though born in the same year as Pitt, was sent three years later to Cambridge. There the two young men were but slightly acquainted; but at the General Election of 1780, Wilberforce was, after a sharp contest, returned for the town of Hull, and meeting Pitt both in the House of Commons and in social circles, they rapidly grew friends.

These young men and several others—about twenty-five in all—besides their resort at the larger clubs, as Brooks's and White's, formed at this time a more intimate society called Goostree's, from the name of the person at whose house they met in Pall Mall. Pitt was one of the chief frequenters of this little club, and during one winter—probably that from 1781 to 1782—is said to have supped there every night. How delightful was his conversation in his easier hours Mr. Wilberforce has warmly attested:—

'He was the wittiest man I ever knew, and, what was quite peculiar to himself, had at all times his wit under entire control. Others appeared struck by the unwonted association of brilliant images; but every possible combination of ideas was present to his mind, and he could at once produce whatever he desired. I was one of those who met to spend an evening in memory of Shakespeare at the Boar's Head in East-cheap. Many professed wits were present, but Pitt was the most amusing of the party, and the readiest and most apt in the required allusions."[1]

Another of the Boar's Head party, Mr. Jekyll, gives of it a similar account:

'We were all in high spirits, quoting and alluding to Shakespeare the whole day, and it appeared that Mr. Pitt was as well and familiarly read in the poet's works as the best Shakespearians present.'[2]

The clubs of London, Goostree's not excepted, all at this time afforded a dangerous temptation. Fox, Fitzpatrick, and their circle, had long since set the example of high play. It had become the fashion; and Wilberforce himself was nearly ensnared by it. On the very first day that he went to Boodle's he won twenty-five guineas of the Duke of Norfolk. His diary at this period records more than once the loss of a hundred pounds at the faro-table. He was reclaimed from this pursuit by a most generous impulse—not because he lost in private play to others, but because he saw and was pained at seeing others lose to him. Of the young member for Appleby he proceeds to speak as follows:

'We played a good deal at Goostree's, and I well remember the intense earnestness which Pitt displayed when joining in those games of chance. He perceived their increasing fascination, and soon after suddenly abandoned them for ever.'

It was not long before Mr. Pitt took part in the debates. He made his first speech on the 26th of February, in support of Burke's Bill for Economical Reform. Under the circumstances, this first speech took him a little by surprise. Lord Nugent was speaking against the Bill, and Mr. Byng, member for Middlesex, asked Mr. Pitt to follow in reply. Mr. Pitt gave a doubtful answer, but in the course of Lord Nugent's speech resolved that he would not. Mr. Byng, however, had understood him to assent, and had said so to some friends around him; so that the moment Lord Nugent sat down, all these gentlemen, with one voice, called out 'Mr. Pitt! Mr. Pitt!' and by their cry probably kept down every other member. Mr. Pitt, finding himself thus called upon, and observing that the House waited to hear him, thought himself bound to rise. The sudden call did not for a moment discompose him; he was from the beginning collected and unembarrassed, and, far from reciting a set speech, addressed himself at once to the business of reply. Never, says Bishop Tomline, were higher expectations formed of any person upon his first coming into Parliament, and never were expectations more completely fulfilled. The silvery clearness of his voice, his lofty yet unpresuming demeanour, set off to the best advantage his close and well arrayed though unpremeditated arguments, while the ready selection of his words and the perfect structure of his sentences were such as even the most practised speakers often fail to show. Not only did he please, it may be said that he astonished the House. Scarce one mind in which a reverent thought of Chatham did not rise.

[1] Life of Wilberforce, by his Sons, vol. i. p. 18.
[2] Note to Bishop Tomline's Life, vol. i. p. 43.

No sooner had Pitt concluded than Fox with generous warmth hurried up to wish him joy of his success. As they were still together, an old member, said to have been General Grant, passed by them and said, 'Aye, Mr. Fox, you are praising young Pitt for his speech. You may well do so; for, excepting yourself, there is no man in the House can make such another; and, old as I am, I expect and hope to hear you both battling it within these walls, as I have heard your fathers before you.' Mr. Fox, disconcerted at the awkward turn of the compliment, was silent and looked foolish; but young Pitt, with great delicacy and readiness, answered, 'I have no doubt, General, you would like to attain the age of Methuselah!'[1]

After Mr. Pitt several other members spoke, and the debate was continued until midnight, when, on a division, the measure of Burke was rejected by a majority of 233 against 190.

It deserves to be noted that warmly as the merits of Pitt's first speech were acknowledged by his hearers, those merits are scarcely to be traced in the meagre report of it which alone remains. So imperfect indeed was still, and for many years afterwards, the Parliamentary system of reporting, that it totally fails to give any just idea of the great orators of the time, except in a few salient passages, and unless, as was the case with Burke in his chief speeches, they prepared their own compositions for the press. For this reason, among others, I shall forbear from inserting in my narrative any but very few and very brief extracts of Mr. Pitt's published speeches, which my readers can, if they desire it, find elsewhere.

Tuesday night, Feb. 27, 1781.

My Dear Mother,—If the length of the debate yesterday, and of a late supper after it, had not made me too lazy this morning, I intended to have been at Hayes to-day. To-morrow I must be early in the House of Commons, to attend the Lyme election, and am therefore doubtful whether I can ride to Hayes and back again in time, which makes me wish to write to you one line at least, in case I should not.

[1] This anecdote was put on record by Fox's nephew, Lord Holland, and I give it in his own words. See the Memorials of Fox by Lord John Russell, vol. i. p. 262.

I know you will have learnt that I heard my own voice yesterday, and the account you have had would be in all respects better than any I can give if it had not come from too partial a friend. All I can say is that I was able to execute in some measure what I intended, and that I have at least every reason to be happy beyond measure in the reception I met with. You will, I dare say, wish to know more particulars than I fear I shall be able to tell you, but in the meantime you will, I am sure, feel somewhat the same pleasure that I do in the encouragement, however unmerited, which has attended my first attempt.

I hope when I come to find you better than I left you, and I trust that will not be later than Thursday at furthest. Pray give my love to Harriot, and best compliments to Mrs. Stapleton.[1] Your most dutiful and affectionate son,

W. Pitt.

'It is a curious fact,' writes Lord Macaulay, 'well remembered by some who were very recently living, that soon after this debate Pitt's name was put up by Fox at Brooks's.'

The merits of Mr. Pitt's performance continued for some days to be discussed in political circles. Lord North said of it, with generous frankness, that it was the best first speech he had ever heard. Still more emphatic was the praise of Mr. Burke. When some one in his presence spoke of Pitt as 'a chip of the old block,' Burke exclaimed, 'He is not a chip of the old block; he is the old block itself!' Dr. Goodenough, subsequently Bishop of Carlisle, exults in one of his letters that the great Lord Chatham is now happily restored to his country. 'All the old members recognised him instantly: to identify him there wanted only a few wrinkles in the face.'[2]

It appears that a little time previously, Pitt had made the earliest trial of his debating powers in a party of some young friends. Mr. Jekyll, who was at this time like himself a barrister on the Western Circuit, thus relates the fact:—'When he first made his brilliant display in Parliament, those at the Bar who had seen little of him expressed surprise; but a few who had heard him once speak in a sort of mock debate at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, when a club called the Western Circuit Club was dissolved, agreed that he had then displayed all the various species of eloquence for which he was afterwards celebrated.' [1]

On the 31st of May Mr. Pitt made his second speech in the House of Commons. The subject was a Bill to continue an Act of the last Session for the appointment of Commissioners of Public Accounts. When Lord North, who had argued the question at considerable length, sat down, Fox and Pitt rose together. But Fox, with a feeling of kindness to the young member, immediately gave way,[2] and Pitt, proceeding in a strain of forcible eloquence, contended that the House of Commons, which the constitution had entrusted with the power of controlling the public expenditure, could not in the faithful discharge of their duty delegate any part of that trust to persons who were not of their own body.

In the division which ensued Colonel Barré and Mr. Pitt were appointed Tellers on the same side. It was far from affording any cause of triumph to the young orator, since Lord North carried his negative by 98 votes against 42.

[1] See a valuable note (of which I shall give the rest in another place) contributed to Bishop Tomline's Life, and inserted in that work at vol. i. p. 42. The Bishop does not name the writer, but describes him as 'very intimate with Mr. Pitt on the Western Circuit,' and as 'holding an honourable station in the Court of Chancery' in 1820; adding other circumstances also which plainly identify his correspondent with Mr. Jekyll.

[2] See Tomline's Life, vol. i. p. 33. Lord Macaulay, by a trifling oversight, has transferred this incident to Pitt's first speech (Biographies, p. 152).

A few days later we find Mr. Wilberforce refer to this second speech as follows in a letter to a friend at Hull:—'The papers will have informed you how Mr. William Pitt, second son of the late Lord Chatham, has distinguished himself. He comes out as his father did, a ready-made orator, and I doubt not but that I shall one day or other see him the first man in the country. His famous speech, however, delivered the other night did not convince me, and I stayed in with the old fat fellow (Lord North).'

In the same month of May Wilberforce himself had for the first time taken part in the debates. He seems on this occasion to have attracted little notice. But ere long he gained the success which his abilities and character deserved, and by degrees grew into high favour with the House as an earnest and excellent speaker.

Mr. Pitt spoke for the third time this Session on the 12th of June, upon a motion of Mr. Fox tending to conclude a peace with the American colonies. It does not appear that the young orator had any thoughts of taking part in this debate, but he was unexpectedly called up by several misrepresentations of his father's sentiments. Here is his own account to Lady Chatham the next day.

June 13, 1781.

The business of yesterday was a triumph to Opposition in everything but the article of numbers, which was indeed some abatement of it—172 to 99. I found it necessary to say somewhat which was very favourably and flatteringly received, in answer to Mr. Rigby and Mr. Adam, who chose to say that my father and every other party in the kingdom who had objected only to the internal taxation of America, and had asserted at that time the other rights of this country, were accessories to the American war. This you may imagine I directly denied, and expressed as strongly as I could how much he detested the principle of the war. I gave several general reasons which occurred to me for the necessity, in every point of view, for an inquiry into the state of the war (which was what Mr. Fox moved for), but avoided saying anything direct on the subject of independence, which in that stage of the business I thought better avoided. I hope you will excuse the haste of this account, as I have a person waiting for me whilst I write.

But besides thus vindicating the opinions of Lord Chatham in regard to the American war, Mr. Pitt took occasion to state with the utmost force his own. 'A noble Lord who spoke early (here he alluded to Lord Westcote) has in the warmth of his zeal called this a holy war. For my part, though the Right Hon. gentleman who made the motion and some other gentlemen have been more than once in the course of the debate severely reprehended for calling it a wicked or accursed war, I am persuaded, and I will affirm that it is a most accursed, wicked, barbarous, cruel, unnatural, unjust, and diabolical war. . . . The expense of it has been enormous, far beyond any former experience, and yet what has the British nation received in return? Nothing but a series of ineffective victories or severe defeats—victories only celebrated with temporary triumph over our brethren whom we would trample down, or defeats which fill the land with mourning for the loss of dear and valuable relations slain in the impious cause of enforcing unconditional submission. Where is the Englishman who on reading the narrative of those bloody and well fought contests can refrain lamenting the loss of so much British blood shed in such a cause, or from weeping on whatever side victory might be declared?'

In reply to Pitt rose Henry Dundas, Lord Advocate, the same who was destined through many coming years to be not only one of Pitt's Cabinet colleagues, but the most trusted and relied on of all. He defended, as he had always done and as he was bound to do, the whole course of the American war; but as regarded his young adversary in that debate, he could not refrain from complimenting 'so happy an union of first-rate abilities, high integrity, bold and honest independence of conduct, and the most persuasive eloquence.'

The debate on this occasion was summed up by Fox with his usual admirable ability, but his motion to go into Committee was rejected as we have seen by overwhelming numbers.

These three were the only speeches made by Mr. Pitt in that session. It closed on the 18th of July. A little time afterwards, when a member of the Opposition happened to remark to Mr. Fox, 'Mr. Pitt, I think, promises to be one of the first men in Parliament,' Fox, without the smallest touch of jealousy, said at once, 'He is so already.'

In the summer of that year, as in the preceding, Mr. Pitt went the Western Circuit. It proved to be for the last time. His whole career at the Bar was indeed so short as to leave little opportunity for the display of his abilities. He was eager to apply himself to it, and resolved to neglect no business, however small. It used to be related by Mr. Justice Rooke how Pitt had dangled seven days with a junior brief and a single guinea fee waiting till a cause of no sort of importance should come on in the Court of Common Pleas. On another occasion, however, in the Court of King's Bench, there being a motion for a Habeas Corpus in the case of a man who was charged with murder, we are assured that Mr. Pitt made a speech which excited the admiration of the Bar, and drew down some words of praise from Lord Mansfield.

On the Circuit he had but little business, yet at Salisbury in the summer of 1781 he was employed by Mr. Samuel Petrie as junior counsel in some bribery causes that had resulted from the Cricklade Election Petition. There are reports of two speeches that he made in these causes, each report, however, extending only to a few lines; and in giving judgment on the point which the second of these speeches involved, Mr.

Baron Perryn said that 'Mr. Pitt's observations had great weight with him.'[1]

It further appears that in the course of these trials Pitt received some high compliments from Mr. Dunning, the leader of the Bar. 'I remember also,' thus writes Mr. Jekyll, one of his brother barristers upon this Circuit, 'that in an action of Crim. Con. at Exeter, he manifested, as junior counsel, such talents in cross-examination, that it was the universal opinion of the Bar that he should have led the cause.'

Of his general character at the Bar, we find Mr. Jekyll speak as follows: 'Among lively men of his own time of life, Mr. Pitt was always the most lively and convivial in the many hours of leisure which occur to young unoccupied men on the Circuit, and joined all the little excursions to Southampton, Weymouth, and such parties of amusement as were habitually formed. He was extremely popular. His name and reputation of high acquirements at the University commanded the attention of his seniors. His wit, his good humour, and joyous manners endeared him to the younger part of the Bar. . . . At Mr. Pitt's instance an annual dinner took place for some years at Richmond Hill, the party consisting of Lord Erskine, Lord Redesdale, Sir William Grant, Mr. Bond, Mr. Leycester, Mr. Jekyll, and others. After he was Minister he continued to ask his old Circuit intimates to dine with him, and his manners were unaltered.'

The Circuit of this summer having ended, Mr. Pitt passed some autumn weeks with his mother at Burton Pynsent, and during a part of this time they were joined by Mr. Pretyman. But in the first days of October we find him on a visit in Dorsetshire, and at the close of that month again in chambers.

Kingston Hall,[1] Oct. 7, 1781.

My Dear Mother,—I have delayed writing to you longer than I intended, which I hope is of little consequence, as Harriot will have brought you all the news I could have sent—an account of that stupid fête at Fonthill,[2] which, take it altogether, was, I think, as ill imagined, and as indifferently conducted, as anything of the sort need be. She will, I hope, also have acknowledged that although somewhat duller, she found it much less formidable than she imagined, which was one great point in its favour. By meeting Lord Shelburne and Lord Camden, we were pressed to make a second visit to Bowood, which, from the addition of Colonel Barré and Mr. Dunning, was a very pleasant party. Since that time I have been waging war, with increasing success, on pheasants and partridges. I shall continue hostilities, I believe, about a week longer, and then prepare for the opening of another sort of campaign in Westminster Hall. Parliament, I am very glad to hear, is not to meet till the 27th of November, which will allow me a good deal more leisure than I expected.

Lincoln's Inn, Oct. 24, 1781.

I rejoice that the prospect of seeing you at Hayes draws nearer, and I flatter myself too with the hopes of finding your course of amendment much increased and confirmed. There is no fresh news in town. The last account from America seems, if anything were wanting, to complete our prospect there.

Parliament met again on the 27th November. Only two days before had come the tidings of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at York Town. It was necessary for that reason to new-cast the Royal Speech. The Ministers were grievously depressed, while their opponents gathered strength and energy in the same proportion. On the Address, an amendment was moved by Fox, and both he and Burke put forth all their powers of debate. So also next day, on the Report of the Address, did Pitt. Such was the applause in the House when he sat down that it was some time before the Lord Advocate, who rose immediately, could obtain a hearing.

The speech of Henry Dundas on this occasion was not a little surprising. In a tone of great frankness, and paying the highest compliments to Pitt, he let fall some hints of discordant views or erroneous conduct in the Ministry to which he still belonged: but he would no further explain himself. So acute a politician must have clearly discerned the tottering state of Lord North, and may not have felt unwilling, even at this time, to connect himself with a young statesman of popular principles and rising fame.

Compliments to the young statesman were, however, by no means peculiar to Dundas. We are told in a youthful letter from Sir Samuel Romilly, that in one of these debates before Christmas, 1781, 'Fox, in an exaggerated strain of panegyric, said he could no longer lament the loss of Lord Chatham, for he was again living in his son, with all his virtues and all his talents.'[1]

About a fortnight after the Address, Pitt made his second speech of the Session, and his last before the holidays. Horace Walpole, who was still in his old age a most keen observer of everything that passed around him, has an entry as follows in his journal:—'December 14, 1781. Another remarkable debate on Army Estimates, in which Pitt made a speech with amazing logical abilities, exceeding all he had hitherto shown, and making men doubt whether he would not prove superior even to Charles Fox.'

In this speech Mr. Pitt gave a surprising proof of the readiness of debate which he had already acquired, or I may rather say which he had from the first displayed. Lord George Germaine had taken occasion two days before to declare that, be the consequences what they might, he would never consent to sign the independence of the colonies. Lord North, on the contrary, had shown strong symptoms of yielding. Pitt was inveighing with much force against these discordant counsels at so perilous a juncture, when the two Ministers whom he arraigned drew close and began to whisper, while Mr. Welbore Ellis, a grey-haired placeman, of diminutive size, the butt of Junius, under the by-name of Grildrig, bent down his tiny head between them. Here Pitt paused in his argument, and glancing at the group exclaimed, 'I will wait until the unanimity is a little better restored. I will wait until the Nestor of the Treasury has reconciled the difference between the Agamemnon and the Achilles of the American war.'

A few days later, Parliament adjourned for several weeks of Christmas holiday. No sooner had it reassembled than the Opposition resumed their attacks with fresh spirit and success. Mr. Fox made the first onset on the 24th of January, 1782: it was directed against the Earl of Sandwich, as First Lord of the Admiralty. Pitt spoke several times to enforce these charges, which were renewed in various forms.

'I support the motion,' he said, 'from motives of a public nature, and from those motives only. I am too young to be supposed capable of entertaining any personal enmity against the Earl of Sandwich; and I trust that when I shall be less young it will appear that I have early determined, in the most solemn manner, never to allow any private and personal consideration whatever to influence my public conduct at any one moment of my life.'

It should be observed that these remarkable words have been put on record, though not so stated, from the personal testimony of Mr. Pretyman, who appears to have been present in the gallery that evening. They are not to be found in the corresponding passage of the Parliamentary Debates.[1]

Lady Chatham having before that period returned to Hayes, there was probably scarce a week in which she did not receive a visit from her son. His letters to her during this spring are accordingly few and of little interest. Here, however, are some extracts:—

Lincoln's Inn, Wednesday (Jan. 1782).

I am very unlucky in having been prevented by the weather this morning from mounting my horse; and the more so because fresh engagements arise every hour which make it difficult for me to have the pleasure of looking at you at Hayes. I thought it impossible that anything should interfere with my intention to-morrow; but (what is very mal a propos, considering how seldom it has occurred) I have some law business just now put into my hands, which must be done without delay.

March 9, 1782.

I came to town yesterday in time for a very good debate; and a division which, though not victorious, is as encouraging as possible—216 against 226, on a question leading directly to removal, is a force that can hardly fail. Another trial will be made in the course of the week, and probably on Thursday, on which day I shall be able to attend without much inconvenience. To-morrow morning I return to Salisbury, and unluckily the hour at which I must set out will not give me a chance of seeing you first. Knowing of some little business that I shall be engaged in there, it is of importance to me to be in time. I trust to have the pleasure of finding you here at my next glimpse of London.

Goostree's, half-past one (March 16, 1782).

After an excellent debate we have lost our question by a division of 236 against 227, which is indeed everything but a victory.

It is not necessary that I should go through in detail the long series of able and vigorous attacks upon the Government by which the Parliamentary annals of this spring are distinguished. In several of them Mr. Pitt took part with great applause. Sometimes the Ministers underwent defeat, and sometimes they only escaped it by most narrow majorities. Notwithstanding the King's wishes and entreaties, their resignation could be no longer deferred. It was announced on the 20th of March to the House of Commons by Lord North, speaking, as ever, with excellent taste and temper; and the King, though coldly and ungraciously, consented to accept the Marquis of Rockingham as his new Prime Minister.

In the distribution of offices which ensued it was sought to combine both the parties in Opposition. Mr. Fox and Lord Shelburne became joint Secretaries of State, Lord Camden President, the Duke of Grafton Privy Seal, and Lord John Cavendish Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was recommended to that office mainly by his name and rank; but still, as to his mental qualities, does not quite deserve to be called, as Lord Brougham calls him, 'the most obscure of mankind.' Lord Thurlow, whose energy had gained him both the personal favour of the King and the political guidance of the House of Peers, was continued Lord Chancellor. Henry Dundas, in like manner, was continued Lord Advocate. Burke was promoted to the lucrative office of Paymaster, but not deemed worthy of a seat in the Cabinet. No more was Thomas Townshend, who accepted the post of Secretary-at-War. Other rich offices were bestowed on Barré and Dunning, the latter being also shortly afterwards raised to the peerage as Lord Ashburton.

The son of Chatham was not included in the new arrangements. Some ten days before Lord North had announced his resignation, but while that resignation was foreseen as close impending, Pitt had taken occasion, in the House of Commons, to use words to the following effect: "For myself, I could not expect to form part of a new administration; but were my doing so more within my reach, I feel myself bound to declare that I never would accept a subordinate situation.' Young as he was, he had determined that he would not be held as committed to measures in framing which he had no share. He had determined that he would serve his Sovereign as a Cabinet Minister, or not at all.

Such a resolution is only to be justified by the consciousness and by the reputation of extraordinary powers. Even at the present time such a resolution might justly excite surprise, and be regarded as presumptuous from a young man not yet twenty-three; but in the time of Pitt it must have seemed more surprising and more presumptuous still. The Cabinet was then a much smaller body than at present. In 1770, on the first formation of his Government, Lord North made it of seven. In 1783, as we shall see hereafter, Pitt himself made it of seven also. Admission to such an assembly was of course a much higher distinction than it could be to Cabinets of fourteen and sixteen; and some men even of the most powerful intellects, as Burke and Sheridan, were never to the end of their lives invited to enter its doors.

It is said indeed that Pitt had no sooner sat down than he felt he might have gone too far, and consulted Admiral Keppel, who was next him, whether he should not rise again and explain. This was told by Sir Robert Adair to the Earl of Albemarle, as derived from Keppel himself.[1] All three authorities are entitled to high respect; yet it does not seem very likely that the determination announced by Pitt could have been formed at the spur of the moment, or could therefore have been liable to so sudden a revulsion. The statement of Bishop Tomline, on the contrary, implies that the determination of Pitt was deliberate, and not announced till some days after it was formed.

Certain it is that Mr. Pitt showed no irresolution when, upon the change of Government consequent on Lord North's resignation, he had before him the choice of several subordinate posts. These offers came to him through his friend Lord Shelburne, for with Lord Rockingham he had no more than a slight acquaintance.

[1] See the Memoirs of Lord Rockingham, vol. ii. p. 423.

The Vice-Treasurership of Ireland was especially pressed upon him. It was an office of light work and high pay, the latter being computed at no less than 5,000*l*. a-year. It was an office to which Pitt might the rather incline because his father had formerly held it; but the young barrister preferred his independence with chambers and not quite 300*l*. a year.

Mr. Pitt did not evince the smallest displeasure or resentment at his own omission from the highest rank of offices. He publicly expressed, on several occasions, his good opinion of the Government; and he cheerfully gave it his general support, while still pursuing his own independent line.

The question to which, beyond any other at this time, Mr. Pitt applied himself, was to amend the representation of the people in the House of Commons. Parliamentary Reform had followed close in the wake of Economical Reform. The lavish expense and the ill success of the American war in its concluding stages led many persons to forget that the prosecution of that war, even at such expense, had been for some years a popular object with the country at large, as might be amply shown by the avowal, at the time, of the Opposition chiefs themselves. It was now on the contrary contended, from the experience of the last fifteen or twenty months, that the members for the close boroughs had been the main strength on which the war party relied. A cry against these boroughs rapidly arose, and the cause of Parliamentary Reform was espoused with great ardour by many persons—by no one with greater than by the Rev. Christopher Wyvill, a clergyman of an old family in Yorkshire. His 'Correspondence' upon this subject, which he subsequently published, extends over six volumes and twenty years; and affords the best materials for the history, at that time, of a cause not until long afterwards destined to prevail.

Under the influence of Mr. Wyvill and other zealous party men, a general meeting of the friends of Parliamentary Reform was convened in London. It was held at the house of the Duke of Richmond, who was then Master of the Ordnance and a member of the Cabinet in the new administration. Here it was determined that the question should be immediately submitted to the House of Commons. Mr. Pitt was fixed upon as the fittest person to bring it forward, and the offer being made to him he undertook the task.

On the 7th of May, after the House had been in due form called over—a practice at that time customary to secure a full attendance—Pitt brought forward this great question in a speech of considerable length. To combine in his support all classes of Reformers, he carefully refrained, both in his speech and motion, from any specific statement of a plan: he moved only for a Select Committee to examine into the state of the representation. With resolute boldness he inveighed against 'the corrupt influence of the Crown—an influence which has been pointed at in every period as the fertile source of all our miseries—an influence which has been substituted in the room of wisdom, of activity, of exertion, and of success—an influence which has grown up with our growth and strengthened with our strength, but which unhappily has not diminished with our diminution, nor decayed with our decay.' Such is one of the very few sentences that can well be cited from the abridged and most tame report of his animated speech; but in arguments, of which only the mere groundwork is preserved, he declared himself the enemy of the close boroughs—the strongholds of that corruption of which he had complained. He pointed out the great anomaly (for an anomaly all must own it to be) that some decayed villages, almost destitute of population, should send members to Parliament under the control of the Treasury, or at the bidding of some great Lord or Commoner, the owner of the soil; and he asked emphatically, 'Is this representation?' He further appealed to the memory of a person of whom he said that every member of the House could speak with more freedom than himself; and he declared, as of his own knowledge, that this person (I need scarcely say that he referred to his father)—a person, he added, not apt to indulge in vague or chimerical speculations inconsistent with practice and expediency—had held the opinion that unless a more solid and equal system of representation were established, this nation, great and happy as it might have been, would come to be confounded in the mass of those whose liberties were lost in the corruption of the people.

When Pitt sat down, as he did amidst loud applause, a veteran reformer, Mr. Alderman Sawbridge, rose and seconded the motion he had made.

The new Government was by no means united on this question. The Duke of Richmond, for example, had been among its first promoters. But the sentiments of Lord Rockingham, so far as we can trace them through the haze of faulty grammar and confused expressions in his letter to Mr. Pemberton Milnes,[1] were secretly adverse. Those of Burke were openly hostile. It was with some difficulty that Fox, who took the contrary part, prevailed on him to stay away from the debate. Fox himself spoke in favour of the motion; so also did Sheridan and Sir George Savile. On the other hand Pitt found himself opposed by his cousin Thomas Pitt of Boconnoc, who objected to the motion as too vague and undefined; by his coming friend, the Lord Advocate; by Rolle, the member for Devonshire; and by several besides. On dividing, the motion was lost by only twenty votes in a House of more than three hundred members, the numbers being 161 against 141. Lord Macaulay has observed that the Reformers never again had so good a division till the year 1831.

On the 17th of May a branch of the same subject was again brought forward by Alderman Sawbridge, who proposed a Bill 'to shorten the duration of Parliaments.' Both Fox and Pitt spoke in favour of the motion, but it was rejected by a large majority. Mr. Burke could not be withheld from taking part in this debate or from reverting to the former question. Thus in a private letter to a friend in Ireland does Sheridan describe the scene: 'On Friday last Burke acquitted himself with the most magnanimous indiscretion, attacked William Pitt in a scream of passion, and swore Parliament was and always had been precisely what it ought to be, and that all people who thought of reforming it wanted to overturn the Constitution.'[1]

On the 19th of June Mr. Pitt spoke with much warmth and ability in support of a Bill which had been introduced by Lord Mahon for preventing bribery at elections. Mr. Fox, though with many expressions of courtesy to Pitt, took the opposite side, 'and this,' says Bishop Tomline, 'was, I believe, the first question upon which they happened to differ before any separation took place between them. I must, however, remark that although they had hitherto acted together in Parliament, there had been no intimacy or confidential intercourse between them.'[2]

In Committee on this Bill, Lord Mahon consented to give up several points in the hope to render the measure more palatable to the House. Thus he struck out the words that forbade candidates to hire horses or carriages for the conveyance of voters to the poll. But the clause still provided that the money for this purpose should not be paid to the elector on any account whatever, under the penalties of disfranchisement for ever of the elector, and of incapacity to the candidate of sitting in that Parliament. Mr. Pitt supported this clause, which Mr. Fox and other gentlemen thought too severe, and on a division it was rejected by a majority of 26. 'This incapacitating clause contained,' said Lord Mahon, 'the very pith and marrow of my Bill,' which, thus mutilated, he declined any further to proceed with.

On the 25th of June both Fox and Pitt spoke in support of a motion which was levelled at Lord North and his colleagues. It was to direct the payment into the Exchequer of the balances remaining in the hands of Mr. Rigby, late Paymaster of the Forces, and of Mr. Ellis, late Treasurer of the Navy. The motion was opposed by Lord North, and rejected by a majority of 11, showing how powerful was still the party of the late administration in the House of Commons.

During the three months that had elapsed since the late administration fell, vehement differences had already arisen in the new. The Chancellor was on ill terms with most of his colleagues, and was suspected of caballing against them. Fox and Shelburne, as joint Secretaries of State, were jealous of each other, and the more so since the line between their departments had not been accurately drawn. The negotiations for peace were no easy task. The affairs of Ireland had grown to be most critical, and could not be adjusted without some conflict of opinion. So early as mid-April we find Fox in one of his private letters complain of 'another very teasing and wrangling Cabinet.' [1]

To quell these dissensions among his colleagues there was needed a man of energy as Premier. Lord Rockingham, on the contrary, with the best intentions, was on every point timid, feeble, indecisive. It seems impossible that he could have much longer kept together the jarring elements that were, at least nominally, committed to his charge; but in the course of June he fell sick, and on the 1st of July he died.

The Cabinet at once fell asunder. His Majesty sent for Lord Shelburne and offered him the vacant post of First Lord of the Treasury. Lord Shelburne accepted the offer. Most of the other Ministers acquiesced in it, but Fox was fully determined not to bear the dominion of his rival. He leagued himself with his chosen friend Lord John Cavendish, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and they both came to the conclusion that the fittest man for Prime Minister was Lord John's brother by marriage, the Duke of Portland, at that time Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Portland was in all points the very counterpart of Rockingham. Like him he was a man of high birth, of princely fortune, of honourable character, of nervous shyness, and of very moderate abilities. It was plainly designed that Fox's own pre-eminent abilities should govern the country under his Grace's name.

In fulfilment of their resolution Fox and Cavendish proceeded to press upon the King the nomination of the Duke of Portland to the Treasury. But the King saw no reason to revoke his appointment of Lord Shelburne, and on His Majesty's refusal the two Ministers resigned. They were followed by the Duke of Portland from Dublin Castle, as also by Burke, Sheridan, and some few others from the lower ranks of office, and they continued to be supported by a considerable body of adherents in the House of Commons.

But from the public they obtained little sympathy. The resignation of Fox was in general regarded as indefensible on any public grounds. Among his independent friends many of the most high-minded disapproved it. Such was especially the case with Sir George Savile. It seemed to carry out to their worst extreme the oligarchical principles at that time of the great Whig houses. Was it to be borne in a free country that no man but the heir of some one of these houses should ever be deemed fit for the highest place in public affairs? And there was another circumstance which, as Horace Walpole remarks in one of his letters of this date, added not a little to the ridicule of this pretension. 'It is not merely,' he says, 'that a few great families claim the hereditary and exclusive right of giving us a head, but they will insist upon selecting a head without a tongue!'

Fortified as he hoped by popular opinion, but exposed to unfavourable chances in the House of Commons, the new Prime Minister proceeded to fill up the vacant offices. Earl Temple, the first cousin of Pitt, was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with his brother William Grenville as Chief Secretary. The seals of Secretary of State, as relinquished by Fox and Shelburne, were entrusted to Thomas Townshend and Lord Grantham. The place of Chancellor of the Exchequer was offered to Pitt, and by him accepted. And thus did Pitt attain one of the highest offices of Government only a few weeks after he had completed the age of twenty-three.

In the new administration the leadership of the House of Commons was nominally vested in the senior member, Mr. Secretary Townshend; but it was Pitt on whom Lord Shelburne relied to confront the great orators ranged in the Opposition ranks; and in fact, as appeared in the sequel, it was Pitt who took the prominent part in every debate.

The Parliament was quickly prorogued after a day of Ministerial explanations in both Houses. In the Commons, Pitt, whose writ was not yet moved, whose appointment even was not yet announced, was able to take part in the debate, and there was now for the first time an altercation conducted with some keenness between him and Fox. 'The late Right Hon. Secretary,' said the young orator, 'is to be looked upon as public property, and as such I have a right to question him as to his conduct in resigning an important post. . . . It was in my opinion a dislike to men, and not to measures; and there appears to be something personal in the business; for if the Right Hon. gentleman had such an aversion as he now professes to the political sentiments of Lord Shelburne, how came he, only three months ago, to accept him as a colleague?'

In the other House Lord Shelburne defended the stand which he had made against the dictation of Fox and Cavendish, by his adherence to the maxims of one whom he called his master in politics, the late Earl of Chatham. 'That noble Earl,' he said, 'always declared that the country ought not to be governed by any oligarchical party or family connection, and that if it was to be so governed, the Constitution must of necessity expire. And on these principles,' added Shelburne, 'I have always acted.'

The familiar letters of Mr. Pitt to his mother will best portray his feelings and conduct at this time and for some time afterwards. I shall either insert them at length or extract from them, as usual, all passages of interest, and with these extracts the present chapter shall conclude.

Lincoln's Inn, June 27, 1782.

My brother tells me he has mentioned to you that Lord Rockingham is ill, which is unfortunately in the way of anything more at present; but Lord S. told me yesterday that Lord R. had expressed himself as wishing to do something that might give you a security for the future. You are very good in thinking of communicating any share of what I am sure your own occasions may demand entire; mine are not so pressing but that they will wait very tolerably at present; and I shall expect that Westminster Hall will, in good time, supply all that is wanting.

The Circuit begins on Tuesday sennight. I hope to call in my way westward, if not certainly in my return; and I shall undoubtedly be able to make some stay after it is over, though my plan for the remainder of the summer is not quite settled. I hope Mrs. Stapleton is by this time added to your society, and as well as usual. My brother, I believe, has not informed you of a match of which the world here is certain, but of which he assures me he knows nothing, between himself and the beauty in Albemarle Street.[1] There is no late public news; but our fleet is, I believe, sailing, which will probably furnish some very important. Lord Rockingham's very precarious state occasions a great deal of suspense, and if it ends ill, may, I am afraid, produce a great deal of confusion. Whether that may not happen any way is indeed more than one can be sure of as things stand.

Tuesday, July 2, 1782.

My Dear Mother,—I am much obliged to you for your letter, but very sorry to think that the unavoidable engagement which produced the interval in my letters left you in that state of suspense which distance too naturally produces. I hope you will have received at the due time the letter I wrote last Saturday. After what I then mentioned, it will not be a surprise to you to hear that the event of Lord Rockingham's death took place yesterday morning. What the consequences of it will be to the public cannot yet quite be foreseen. With regard to myself, I believe the arrangement may be of a sort in which I may, and probably ought to take a part. If I do, I think I need not say you pretty well know the principles on which I shall do it. In this short time nothing is settled, and I only saw what were the strong wishes of some who foresaw the event. But how different pretensions will be adjusted is a matter of great uncertainty. As soon as I am able to let you know particulars, I will do it by a safer conveyance, and give you notice. You will not wonder if I write in some haste. I am very glad to hear that Harriot is better.

The business depending will probably be settled one way or other before I need decide about the Circuit.

I am, my dear Mother, &c., W. Pitt.

My poor servant John has had a violent attack of his old complaint, which has been of a very serious nature. He is getting better, and I hope in a good way, though still very ill. I think he seems very much to wish to see his wife, though he does not care directly to send for her. But I believe if you would have the goodness to send her up by the coach, and furnish what is wanting for her journey, it would be a great comfort to him, as he will, I fear, in no case be quite well a good while. I have got a servant that will do in his stead for the present.

Friday, July 5, 1782.

You will, I am sure, be impatient to hear something more from me. Things begin to be pretty near settled, and on the whole I hope well for the country, though not precisely as one would have wished. Fox has chosen to resign, on no ground that I can learn but Lord Shelburne being placed at the Treasury. Lord J. Cavendish also quits, which is not surprising, as he accepted at first merely on Lord Rockingham's account. Other inferior changes will take place in some departments; but the bulk stand firm. My lot will be either at the Treasury as Chancellor of the Exchequer, or in the Home department as Secretary of State. The arrangement cannot be finally settled till to-morrow or next day, but everything promises as well as possible in such circumstances. Mr. Townshend certainly makes part of this fresh arrangement, and probably in a more forward post, which is to me an infinite satisfaction. Lord Shelburne's conduct is everything that could be wished. Parliament adjourns in a day or two, and little or nothing can pass there till next Session. The principal thing I shall have to regret will be the probability of this delaying my having the happiness of seeing you; though I trust it will not do that for the whole summer.

I have written in great haste, and at first with a view to the post; but I believe it will become more the discretion which I must now have about me not to send it by that conveyance. I forgot to say that Mr. J. Grenville either continues in his present situation or takes a new one; perfectly disapproving of the step Fox has taken. This I am sure you will be glad to hear.

Grafton Street, July 16, 1782.

Our new Board of Treasury has just begun to enter on business; and though I do not know that it is of the most entertaining sort, it does not seem likely to be very fatiguing. In all other respects my situation satisfies, and more than satisfies me, and I think promises everything that is agreeable. . . . Lord North will, I hope, in a very little while make room for me in Downing Street, which is the best summer town house possible.

Grafton Street, July 30, 1782.

I am not able to tell whether I can succeed as I wish for your Welsh friend. Of all the secrets of my office I have in this short time learnt the least about patronage. I rather believe this branch belongs almost entirely to the First Lord, though certainly recommendations will have their weight there. I think I need not say that I will try as far as I can with propriety. Harriot's request, or rather her neighbour's (for I certainly do not charge Harriot with being too pressing a solicitor), is, I am afraid, of a sort which I cannot much forward; but I will consider whether I can do anything, and let her know. In the meantime she may be perfectly assured that I am not yet so tired of being asked as to take it very ill of her to have been the channel of it. I expect to be comfortably settled in the course of this week in a part of my vast, awkward house.

Grafton Street, Aug. 10, 1782.

I must certainly plead guilty to the charges you have to make against me as a correspondent, which, however, I hope you will have less cause for in future. At the same time, though I am very far from pretending never to have an hour of leisure, you may imagine that business may sometimes come at such a time as to prevent writing, or at least to prevent writing with great accuracy. I had understood before from Lord Shelburne the substance of what you mention out of his letter to you, which is certainly on the whole very favourable; and as I am sure he will not be disposed to lose any time in the business, I have no sort of doubt that you will soon perceive the good effect.[1]

My secretary, whom you wish to know, is a person whose name you may probably never have heard, a Mr. Bellingham, an army friend of my brother. You will wonder at a secretary from the army; but as the office is a perfect sinecure, and has no duty but that of receiving about four hundred a year, no profession is unfit for it. I have not yet any private secretary, nor do I perceive, at least as yet, any occasion for it.

[1] As regarded the payment of arrears in Lady Chatham's pension.

Downing Street, Sept. 5, 1782.

I have not had so much of a Hayes life as you seem to imagine, as I have been able to go there but for two nights this fortnight. I hope to be able to steal a few days before long for shooting, though I find the vacation by no means a recess from business. I wish I could see a prospect of its allowing me to look in upon you at Burton.

Downing Street, Sept. 12, 1782.

I am much obliged to you for your letter, which I received yesterday on my return from Cheveley, where I had been for two days. A short visit for such a distance; but as my brother was going there, I thought it worth the exertion, and it was very well repaid by a great deal of air and exercise in shooting, and the finest weather in the world. The finest part of all indeed is a fine east wind, which, as the fleet is just sailed for Gibraltar, is worth everything. I assure you I do not forget the lessons I have so long followed, of riding in spite of business; though I indeed want it less than ever, as I was never so perfectly well. All I have to do now is to be done quite at my own hours, being merely to prepare for the busy season; which is very necessary to be done, but which at the same time is not a close confinement. We are labouring at all sorts of official reform, for which there is a very ample field, and in which I believe we shall have some success.

Sunday (Dec. 1782).

The Gibraltar business, I reckon, stands fairer since our last debate; but I shall not be sorry if, finally, it does not come in question at the conclusion of the treaty, of which there is some chance.

I shall be impatient to receive orders at the Treasury on a subject where I cannot well be the first to give them.[1]

CHAPTER III.

Acknowledgment of American independence—Proposed cession of Gibraltar—Preliminary treaties with France and Spain—Conference between Pitt and Fox—Coalition of Fox and North—Defeat of Lord Shelburne—Pitt's great speech in vindication of the Peace—Resignation of Lord Shelburne—Pitt refuses the offer of the Treasury—Resigns office of Chancellor of the Exchequer—Duke of Portland's Ministry—Pitt in private life—Again brings forward Parliamentary Reform, but is defeated—Prince of Wales—Marriage of Lord Chatham.

As the autumn advanced, and the period for the re-assembling of Parliament drew near, the new Ministers became more and more impressed with the difficulties which they might expect in the House of Commons. It seemed most desirable that they should endeavour to gain strength from the ranks of Opposition. The Opposition at that time consisted, as we have seen, of two parties, as yet wholly unconnected and wide asunder—the party of Mr. Fox and the party of Lord North, and with either of these a junction might perhaps be made. On that point, however, the wishes of the First Lord of the Treasury and of his Chancellor of the Exchequer were by no means the same. Lord Shelburne, as was natural, resented the violence of Fox against himself, and inclined far rather to a coalition with Lord North. But Pitt positively declared that nothing should induce him to concur in this last scheme. He retained his strong aversion to the conduct of the American war, and to its authors, but was willing and desirous to rejoin those who, like Fox, had been united with him in opposing that war and in hurling Lord North from power.

The wishes of Pitt in this direction were earnestly supported by several other members of the Cabinet, as by General Conway and by Admiral, now Viscount, Keppel. They had long been adherents of Fox; and, though continuing in office, chafed at their separation from him. But the repugnance of Lord Shelburne was as yet unconquerable. Amidst these jarring counsels the time went on to the meeting of Parliament: no resolution was taken, and no overtures in any quarter were made.

The meeting of Parliament had been fixed for the 26th of November. It was further prorogued to the 5th of the following month, in hopes that the peace might meanwhile be concluded. Provisional articles with America, to be hereafter inserted in a treaty of peace, were indeed signed at Paris on the 30th of November. By these the revolted colonies were in explicit words acknowledged; but the terms with France and Spain were found to require much longer time for their adjustment. On these there was also a material disagreement among the Ministers. Lord Shelburne was desirous of yielding Gibraltar to the Spaniards, receiving in return Porto Rico or some other West India island. Lord Keppel, the Duke of Grafton, and several more members of the Cabinet, were warmly opposed to this exchange. We learn from a cautious passage—the last in my preceding chapter—of Pitt's letters to his mother, that Pitt himself was among the Ministers who stood firm against Lord Shelburne's project, and who finally prevailed.[1]

It may be suspected that, on account of this twofold difference—as to the junction with Fox and as to the exchange of Gibraltar—the cordiality between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his chief had become a little impaired.

It would seem that through the autumn Lord North among his friends had talked much—and as some of them thought, too much—of 'absence, neutrality, moderation.'[1] When the two Houses met on the 5th of December, he appeared in his place and spoke with great temper and forbearance. But nothing could exceed the vehemence of Burke and Fox. Burke especially, who in the explanations of July last, had called Lord Shelburne 'a Borgia and a Catiline,' now inveighed against his 'duplicity and delusion,' and compared him to a serpent with two heads! Some discrepancy there certainly was to complain of in the explanations of the Ministers. In the House of Peers Lord Shelburne had said that the acknowledgment of American independence under the Provisional Articles was only contingent and conditional; while in the Commons both Pitt and Conway declared that, in their judgment, this acknowledgment must be regarded as positive and final.

[1] An extract from the MS. Memoirs of the Duke of Grafton, giving a full account of the dissensions in the Cabinet relative to Gibraltar, has been already published by me in the Appendix, p. xxvi., to the seventh volume of my History of England.

The first part of this Session, which commenced on the 5th of December, was soon interrupted by the approach of the Christmas holidays, and the Parliament was adjourned for one month. There had been already some very keen debates. In all these Pitt had taken the lead on the part of Government, and had maintained the contest, on no unequal terms, with the great orators of the Opposition; and it deserves to be noted—so natural is the supremacy of genius in popular assemblies—that he had taken this chief part without giving any offence to his nominal leader, Mr. Secretary Townshend. That gentleman—once his father's friend, as now his own—continued to act with him on most cordial terms.

During these short holidays we find Pitt, in the following note, summon Lord Mahon to London, probably to concert with him a measure on Parliamentary Reform.

Downing Street: Dec. 28, 1782.

My dear Lord,—I am in great hopes you will be able to come directly to town. This is just the time in which we must fix on something; and, I think, in a day or two we could go through all the necessary discussion before any practical steps are taken. Yours most affectionately,

W. PITT.

The preliminary treaties with France and Spain (for with Holland there as yet was only a truce concluded) being at last brought to an adjustment, were signed at Paris on the 20th of January, 1783. On the 27th they were carried down to both Houses of Parliament—to the Peers by Lord Grantham, to the Commons by his brother Secretary, Townshend. Ample time was left for their consideration, the Addresses to the King in reply being fixed for the 17th of the ensuing month.

It has been admitted by nearly all the writers on that point in the present century that the conditions of these treaties were to the full as favourable as, with such vast odds against us, we had any right to expect or to demand. To the Americans we conceded only the independence which, in fact, they had already won. We gave back to the French Chandernagore and Pondicherry, the settlement of Senegal, and the island of St. Lucia. We gave back to the Spaniards Minorca and both the Floridas. But we retained our Indian empire, that mighty counterpoise to the colonies which we lost on another continent. We retained the rock of Gibraltar, against which the two great Bourbon monarchies had tried their strength in vain. And, as Lord Macaulay with much force observes, England preserved even her dignity, for she ceded to the House of Bourbon only part of what she had conquered from that House in previous wars.

At the time, however, such considerations were by no means duly weighed. No sooner were the terms of the treaties divulged than considerable murmurs arose. The necessity of such concessions was already half forgotten, while the concessions themselves rose full in view. Even those who had most loudly denounced 'a ruinous war' showed equal force of lungs in crying out against 'a ruinous peace.' Under such circumstances the Cabinet found it far from easy to frame the Addresses to be moved in both Houses, and to express at least a qualified approval of the treaties. 'We agreed,' so writes the Duke of Grafton in his manuscript Memoirs, 'that no triumphant words could be carried or ought to be proposed. Those which pleased most were the most moderate, and such were adopted.'

At the time when the treaties were brought down to Parliament the administration of Lord Shelburne was nearly rent asunder by divisions. Already had Keppel retired from the Admiralty, and Richmond ceased to attend the meetings of the Cabinet. Other changes soon ensued. Grafton and Conway expressed themselves as much dissatisfied, and Lord Carlisle threw up his office of Lord Steward.

Thus estranged in great part from his colleagues, and pressed by the want of a majority in Parliament to approve the treaties, Lord Shelburne gave way at last to the earnest representations of Pitt. He reluctantly agreed that Fox and his friends should be invited to re-enter the service of the Crown. Certain it is that, so late as February, 1783, such a junction might have been effected without the smallest sacrifice of public principle on either side. Pitt at once availed himself of this authority. He called upon Fox by appointment at Fox's house, but the conference between them was not a long one. No sooner had Fox heard the object of the visit, than he asked whether it was intended that Lord Shelburne should remain First Lord of the Treasury. Pitt answered in the affirmative. 'It is impossible for me,' Fox rejoined, 'to belong to any administration of which Lord Shelburne is the head.' 'Then we need discuss the matter no further,' said Pitt; 'I did not come here to betray Lord Shelburne;' and so saying he took his leave. Bishop Tomline adds to the account which he has given of this interview, 'This was, I believe, the last time Mr. Pitt was in a private room with Mr. Fox, and from this period may be dated that political hostility which continued through the remainder of their lives.'[1]

In another direction some active steps were taken of his own accord by Henry Dundas, who, under the administration of Lord Shelburne, besides continuing Lord Advocate of Scotland, filled the office of Treasurer of the Navy. He had several conferences with William Adam, a confidential friend of Lord North. 'There is no longer any prospect,' he said, 'none at least for the present, that there will be any overture for a coalition to Lord North from the present Ministry. Lord Shelburne and I have pushed it, but we could not get the other Ministers to agree to it. . . . If Lord Shelburne resigns, Fox and Pitt may yet come together and dissolve Parliament, and there will be an end of Lord North. I see no means of preventing this but Lord North's support of the Address.' And at parting he said again, 'Nothing will answer but an absolute, unconditional support.'

The object of Dundas in these hints was to alarm Lord North into compliance. But he had overshot the mark. Lord North was on the contrary roused into resentment, and altogether demurred to such a peremptory tone. In this altered mood of the late Prime Minister, and with the unabated hostility of Fox, it was plain, taking into account the public temper of the time, that were these two great party leaders to league themselves together, they might certainly command a majority against the Government on the conditions of the peace.

To this combination, however, there were, or there should have been, the strongest obstacles upon both sides. No two statesmen could be more estranged from each other in thought, word, or deed. Not only had Fox during many years opposed all the measures of Lord North's administration, but he had exhausted against him personally the whole vocabulary of invective; he had pronounced him 'void of honour and honesty;' he had thundered for his condign punishment; he had declared, and this but eleven months before, that he would rest satisfied to be called 'the most infamous of mankind' could he for a moment think of making terms with such a man.[1] North, on his part, though in gentler terms, had no less for many years arraigned and denounced the principles of Fox. Yet now, as the overthrow of Lord Shelburne rose before them as a tempting prize, these two eminent men, in an evil hour for their own fame, were gradually drawn together. The secret agent and channel of communication at the outset was on Lord North's side his eldest son, George North, whose own leanings were to the Whigs. There was also on that side William Eden, who some months since had been Chief Secretary in Ireland, and was now perhaps a little impatient for another office. On Fox's part may be mentioned especially his kinsman and close friend Colonel Fitzpatrick, and another of his friends, John Townshend.

[1] Life of Pitt, vol. i. p. 89. From the narrative of the Bishop it might at first sight be inferred that the interview between Fox and Pitt took place towards the close of the year 1782; but the exact date was February 11, 1783, as appears both from a letter of William Grenville (Courts and Cabinets of George III., vol. i. p. 148) and a statement of Henry Dundas (Fox Memorials, vol. ii. p. 33.)

The first interview between Fox and North took place on the 14th of February, at the house of Mr. George North. Both the statesmen showed a frank and manly temper. They agreed to treat Reform of Parliament as an open question between them. They agreed to lay aside all former animosity, Fox declaring that he hoped their administration would be founded on mutual goodwill and confidence, which was the only thing that could make it permanent and useful. They also agreed to oppose the Address upon the Peace, and Lord North drew up the amendment to be moved by Lord John [1] See his speech in the House of Commons of March 5, 1782.

Cavendish. This amendment went no further than to reserve to the House the right at a later period of disapproving the terms; but there was also another clause expressing the regard of Parliament for the American loyalists which was less likely to be palatable to the Whigs, and which therefore Lord North himself undertook to move in a separate form.

Meanwhile Lord Shelburne finding that he had nothing to hope from Fox, had determined to apply to Lord North, even though aware that this step, if it succeeded, would cost him the secession of Pitt from office. It was settled that Rigby, as a personal friend of Lord North, should go to him and propose an interview with Shelburne. The veteran jobber, whetted by the appetite of office, waited accordingly on the late Prime Minister; but by that time Lord North had concluded his treaty with Fox, and he therefore replied to Rigby in few words, 'I cannot meet Lord Shelburne now. It is too late.'

According to notice the Address upon the Peace was moved in both Houses on the 17th of February. In the Lords it was carried by 69 votes against 55. In the Commons it was moved by Mr. Thomas Pitt, while at the special request of William, his friend Wilberforce stood forth as seconder. Lord John Cavendish then moved his amendment, not soaring in his speech above his usual mediocrity. But both North and Fox put forth all their powers. Already was the rumour rife of their confederacy, giving rise to no small amount of reprobation. Fox avowed it only so far as the vote of that evening was concerned, but defended it on broader grounds. 'It is not in my nature,' he said, 'to bear malice or live in ill will; my friendships are perpetual, my enmities not so.' In support of the Government Townshend was clear and full, Dundas acrimonious and able. Pitt, who did not rise till four o'clock, could produce no strong impression on an exhausted House. But he was himself exhausted, and his speech was not good.

'There were perhaps few occasions,' says Bishop Tomline, 'upon which he spoke with less effect.'

In one passage of this speech which was in reply to Sheridan, Pitt dealt severely with what he called his dramatic turns and his epigrammatic points. These he advised Sheridan rather to reserve for the stage, where they would always obtain, as they always deserved, the plaudits of the audience. This taunt was unworthy both of the man and of the occasion, and exposed Pitt to the severest retort that he ever in his life received; for Sheridan sprang on his feet again, as he declared 'only to explain,' and with admirable wit and readiness said, 'If ever I again engage in those compositions to which the Right Hon. gentleman has in such flattering terms referred, I may be tempted to an act of presumption. I may be encouraged by his praises to try an improvement on one of Ben Jonson's best characters in the play of "The Alchymist"—the Angry Boy!'

At length a little before seven in the morning the keen orations ended, the impatient numbers were arrayed, and the combined Oppositions were found to prevail by a majority of sixteen.

Before he retired to bed that morning Mr. Pitt found time for a hasty note.

Downing Street,
Tuesday morning, quarter before Seven,
(Feb. 18, 1783.)

My dear Mother,—You are, I hope, enough used to such things in the political world as changes not to be much surprised at the result of our business in the House of Commons. An amendment was moved on our Address, expunging all commendation of the peace, and the two standards of Lord North and Fox produced 224 against us, 208 for us. This I think decisive. It comes rather sooner than I imagined, though certainly not quite unexpected. We shall at least leave the field with honour. I am just going to bed, and am perfectly well in spite of fatigue.

Your ever dutiful W. PITT.

Notwithstanding this great defeat Lord Shelburne did not at once resign. He had some vague hopes of still maintaining his position, and determined at all events to expect a second blow. He had not long to wait. So early as the 21st Lord John Cavendish brought forward another string of Resolutions pledging the House to preserve inviolate the terms of the peace, but declaring that its concessions were too large. The debate which ensued has not often been surpassed in interest. By that time the new Coalition was openly avowed, and as one of its main authors, Colonel Fitzpatrick, confesses in a private letter, was universally cried out against. Two independent members, Thomas Powys, member for Northamptonshire, and Sir Cecil Wray, who had long been followers of Fox, rose in succession to denounce the 'unnatural alliance.' Many others who could not speak could at least mutter and growl. Fox had not much to say in defence of his own consistency, but that little he said to the best advantage, and he endeavoured to vindicate the Coalition on public grounds, while adverting to the loss of his friends in manly and becoming terms.

If, as may be thought, Pitt had lost some ground in the debate of the 17th, he much more than retrieved that ground in the debate of the 21st. That second speech in its energy and eloquence surpassed any other that he had yet delivered, and must be ranked among the very highest oratorical achievements of his life. Rising immediately after Fox he thus began:—

'Revering, Sir, as I do the great abilities of the Right Honourable gentleman who spoke last, I lament in common with the House when those abilities are misemployed, as on the present question, to inflame the imagination and mislead the judgment. I am told, Sir, "he does not envy me the triumph of my situation this day," a sort of language which becomes the candour of that Honourable gentleman as ill as his present principles. The triumphs of party, Sir, with which this self-appointed Minister seems so highly elate, shall never seduce me to any inconsistency which the busiest suspicion shall presume to glance at. I will never engage in political enmities without a public cause. I will never forego such enmities without the public approbation, nor will I be questioned and cast off in the face of this House by one virtuous and dissatisfied friend.'

From this introduction Pitt proceeded to what still remains by far the most able and convincing among the many vindications of the peace. 'But, Sir,' he said, 'I fear I have too long engaged your attention to no real purpose. For I will not hesitate to surmise, from the obvious complexion of this night's debate, that it has arisen rather in a desire to force the Earl of Shelburne from the Treasury, than in any real conviction that Ministers deserve censure for the concessions they have made. . . . Of the Earl of Shelburne I will say that his merits are as much above my panegyric as the arts to which he owes his defamation are below my notice. . . . I repeat then that it is not this treaty, it is the Earl of Shelburne alone whom the movers of this question are desirous to wound. This is the object which has raised this storm of faction—this is the aim of the unnatural Coalition to which I have alluded. If, however, the baneful alliance is not already formed, if this ill-omened marriage is not already solemnized, I know a just and lawful impediment, and in the name of the public safety I here forbid the Banns!'

Of Lord North in particular the son of Chatham spoke in terms to the full as bitter as Chatham had ever used. 'In short, Sir, whatever appears dishonourable or inadequate in this peace is strictly chargeable to the Noble Lord in the blue riband, whose profusion of the public money, whose notorious temerity and obstinacy in prosecuting the war which originated in his pernicious and oppressive policy, and whose utter incapacity to fill the station he occupied, rendered a peace of any description indispensable to the preservation of the State.'

To the memory of Chatham Pitt appealed with reverent affection. 'My earliest impressions were in favour of the noblest and most disinterested modes of serving the public; these impressions are still dear, and will, I hope, remain for ever dear to my heart; I will cherish them as a legacy infinitely more valuable than the richest inheritance.' And the great orator (for so we may already term him) concluded with some lines of Horace expressing a thought not less lofty than his own.

> 'Laudo manentem; si celeres quatit
> Pennas resigno quæ dedit—
> ———————— probamque
> Pauperiem sine dote quæro.'[1]

The speech of Pitt on this occasion may be regarded as by far the greatest piece of oratory delivered either in ancient or in modern times by any man under twenty-five. Its exact length was of two hours and three-quarters; and some persons who could find no other fault with it were inclined to blame it as too long. Marvellous as it appears when we consider the speaker's age, we must deem it more marvellous still on learning the circumstances of ill health under which he spoke.[2]

Rising after Pitt, Lord North, assailed as he had been, and provoked as he might be, did not lose his customary candour, but began by a tribute of just praise to the 'amazing eloquence' of the last speaker. To Fox, as his new ally, he referred in frank and becoming terms: 'In the early part of that gentleman's career,

[1] Horat. Carm. lib. iii. 29. Bishop Tomline relates that, being under the gallery while Mr. Pitt delivered this speech, a young man, afterwards a distinguished member of Opposition, turned round to him and asked eagerly, 'Why did he omit "Et meâ virtute me involvo"?' An omission, adds the Bishop, generally considered as marking the modesty and good sense of Mr. Pitt.

[2] 'Pitt's famous speech. . . . Stomach disordered, and actually holding Solomon's Porch door open with one hand while vomiting during Fox's speech, to whom he was to reply.'—Wilberforce's Diary, &c. (Life, vol. i. p. 26). 'Solomon's Porch' was the portico behind the old House of Commons.

when I had the happiness to possess his friendship, I knew that he was manly, open, and sincere. As an enemy I have always found him formidable, and a person of most extraordinary talents, to whatever Minister he may be opposed. But in proportion as I had reason to dread him while his principles were adverse to mine, now that they are congenial we shall, with the greater certainty of success, unite with one mind and one heart in the cause of our common country. And let me hail it as an auspicious circumstance in our country's favour, that those who were divided by her hostilities are cemented by her peace.'

Lord North then proceeded to give grounds for his belief that the resources of America were reduced to the lowest ebb:—'In Monday's debate I asked,—if Congress are unable to raise a farthing to carry on a war in the heart of their own country, is it to be supposed that their contributions would be either liberal or cheerful for extending their hostilities to a foreign one? I have had an opportunity since of satisfying myself more fully of the fact, and I find my information to be authentic in every respect. In most of the States they have refused to pay the tax levied by Congress for the service of the war. The Rhode Islanders in particular rose forcibly on the officers who came to collect it, and drove them away. In Massachusetts the tax was discounted in the province, and consequently never carried to the public account.' From these facts Lord North endeavoured to show that, had we insisted on better terms of peace, the Americans must have yielded them. Yet how often before had hopes of this kind been expressed, and how constantly had they been disappointed!

At past three in the morning the House proceeded to divide, when the Opposition found their former majority of sixteen increased by one, the numbers being—for the Government 190, and against it 207.

This second division decided the fate of Shelburne.

On the 23rd he called a meeting of his Cabinet in the morning, and of his supporters in the evening; and to both these meetings announced his intended resignation. Next morning, accordingly, he went to the King and did resign. A few days afterwards, and as a posthumous act of his authority, his steady adherent Thomas Townshend, the Secretary of State, was raised to the peerage as Lord Sydney.

In laying down his office, Lord Shelburne did not, however, advise the King to bestow it upon any chief of the new Coalition. He rather pressed upon His Majesty an idea which Dundas and other friends had pressed upon himself to make Mr. Pitt Prime Minister. The Chancellor concurred in the same counsel to his Sovereign; and George the Third, eager to escape the yoke already fitted to his neck—the yoke of the great Whig houses—grasped at the suggestion. He sent at once to Mr. Pitt, offering him the headship of the Treasury, with full authority to nominate his colleagues. Thus was the whole power of the State, without stint or reservation, laid at the feet of a younger son of a far from wealthy family—of a junior barrister who had received but very few briefs—of a stripling who had not quite attained the age of twenty-four. It is perhaps the most glorious tribute to early promise that any history records.

Pitt, however, was not dazzled. He asked, in the first place, for a day to consult and to decide. But the views and the conduct of the young statesman will best appear from the correspondence at this period of Henry Dundas, the Lord Advocate, with his brother at Edinburgh, and with Pitt himself. To that correspondence, which in 1854 was kindly placed at my disposal by Mr. Dundas of Arniston, I shall add, according to their dates, Mr. Pitt's letters to his mother.

The Lord Advocate to his brother, President Dundas.

February 24, 1783.

Lord Shelburne last night, to a numerous meeting of those who had come into office with him, announced his intention of submitting to his Majesty, this day, the necessity of new-arranging his Government. I am going this day to Court, but I suppose it will be Wednesday before we resign. I cannot yet say what will be the result of all this confusion. Thank God, we have got peace. I wish all this may not disturb the definitive treaty, where several things still remain to be settled. You cannot conceive how much Lord North has fallen in character in the course of this fortnight, from his forming a connection with Charles Fox. In short, it is a contradiction to the whole tenor and principles of his life for thirty years back. In great confidence I send you a copy of a letter I this morning wrote to Lord Shelburne.[1] You will see it is not for common eye. I perhaps may write to you again this night or to-morrow. I am not very sanguine that anything will come of it, but I was resolved to lay it fairly before him. Yours, H. D.

The Lord Advocate to his brother.

February 25, 1783.

My dear Lord,—I cannot be more particular than I was yesterday, except to say that my project in regard to Mr. Pitt was yesterday laid before the King by Lord Shelburne and the Chancellor, who is warm and sanguine in the belief of the success, as are Lord Gower and that whole set of interest. The King received it eagerly, and instantly made the offer to Mr. Pitt, with every assurance of the utmost support. Mr. Pitt desired to think of it. I was with him all last night, and Mr. Rigby and I have been with him all this morning, going through the state of the House of Commons. I have little doubt that he will announce himself Minister to-morrow, and I have as little doubt that the effects of it upon the House of Commons will be instantly felt. Not a human being has a suspicion of the plan, except those in the immediate confidence of it. It will create an universal consternation in the allied camp the moment it is known. Still, secrecy! Yours, H. D.

Mr. Pitt to Lady Chatham.

Tuesday morning, half-past Nine,
February 25, 1783.

My dear Mother,—I wished more than I can express to see you yesterday. I will, if possible, find a moment to-day to tell you the state of things and learn your opinion. In the meantime the substance is, that our friends, almost universally, are eager for our going on, only without Lord Shelburne, and are sanguine in the expectation of success—Lord Shelburne himself most warmly so. The King, when I went in yesterday, pressed me in the strongest manner to take Lord Shelburne's place, and insisted on my not declining it till I had taken time to consider. You see the importance of the decision I must speedily make. I feel all the difficulties of the undertaking, and am by no means in love with the object. On the other hand, I think myself bound not to desert a system in which I am engaged, if probable means can be shown of carrying it on with credit. On this general state of it I should wish anxiously to know what is the inclination of your mind. I must endeavour to estimate more particularly the probable issue by talking with those who know most of the opinions of men in detail. The great article to decide by seems that of numbers.

Your ever dutiful and affectionate, W. Pitt.

Mr. Pitt to Lady Chatham.

Wednesday night, Feb. 26, 1783.

My dear Mother,—The Levee to-day has decided nothing. Many opinions are in favour of the step in question, and none apparently more than the principal one; but the difficulties are notwithstanding many. It must however, I think, end one way or other to-morrow. Your ever dutiful.

W. Pitt.

Mr. Pitt to the Lord Advocate.

Thursday, Feb. 27, 1783,
Two o'clock.

My dear Lord,—I have just been at your house to tell you, which I must do with great pain, what has passed in my mind since I saw you on a subject which seemed then on the point of coming to another issue. I am anxious to apprise you of it the first moment possible. What you stated to me this morning seemed to remove all doubt of my finding a majority in Parliament, and on the first view of it, joined to my sincere desire not to decline the call of my friends, removed at the same time my objections to accepting the Treasury. I have since most deliberately reconsidered the ground, and, after weighing it as fully as is possible for me to do, my final decision is directly contrary to the impression then made on me. I see that the main and almost only ground of reliance would be this,—that Lord North and his friends would not continue in a combination to oppose. In point of prudence, after all that has passed, and considering all that is to come, such a reliance is too precarious to act on. But above all, in point of honour to my own feelings, I cannot form an administration trusting to the hope that it will be supported, or even will not be opposed, by Lord North, whatever the influence may be that determines his conduct. The first moment I saw the subject in this point of view, from which I am sure I cannot vary, unalterably determined me to decline. I write this while I am dressing for Court. I have to beg a thousand pardons for being the occasion of your having so much trouble in vain. This resolution will, I am afraid, both surprise and disappoint you; but you will not wonder at any reconsideration of so important a subject, or at my finally forming whatever decision is dictated by my principles and feelings. I am, with the deepest sense of the friendship you have shown me in all this business, Yours, &c., W. PITT.

The Lord Advocate to his brother.

Five o'clock, P.M.

My dear Lord,—Things are in a more extraordinary state than I could have conceived. I send you copies of three notes I received from the Chancellor in the course of yesterday. I was with Mr. Pitt this morning from 8 o'clock till 11, and parted with him perfectly resolved to accept First Lord of the Treasury; Lord Gower President of the Council; in short, a Government consisting of a coalition with the Bedford interest and the present administration, joined by a great defalcation from the parties both of Lord North and Mr. Fox, and in a very short time Lord North himself supporting, for he and Fox have differed much. All this was settled at 11 o'clock, and I communicated the same to the Chancellor and Lord Gower, all of whom are in immense spirits. They will soon be damped, for the Chancellor, Lord Gower, Lord Aylesford, Lord Weymouth, Lord Mount Stuart, Mr. Rigby, and Mr. [Thomas] Pitt, dine with me, when, in place of our hailing the new Minister, I must communicate to them a letter I have received from Mr. Pitt within this hour, a copy of which I likewise send. How it will all end, God only knows. I don't think I shall give myself any more trouble in the matter.

It is just upon dinner, and I must close.

Yours faithfully, H. DUNDAS.

Mr. Pitt to Lady Chatham.

Sunday, March 2, 1783.

My dear Mother,—I have been coming to you all the morning, which I expected to have been entire leisure, but have been kept till now. I know nothing of the approaching arrangements, further than that Lord North has been with the King. I rejoice much at Lord Sydenham's[1] honours. Lord Grantham will not be overlooked. Whether I refuse depends merely upon whether anything is offered. Taking I must consider as out of the question, as well as continuance in office under any arrangement which can be made; though I believe my former friends are not as much disinclined for it as I am. I am going this fine day to dine with Mr. Wilberforce, at Wimbledon, and shall be back early to-morrow morning, to settle some Treasury business, and a Bill which I must bring in to-morrow; after which I shall be a free man, and shall be able to see you again with a little more certainty. Ever, my dear Mother, &c.,

W. PITT.

It was not long ere authentic rumours spread abroad of the high offer to Pitt, which had thus been tendered and refused. How the public at the time talked or thought of it may be surmised from a passage as follows, in the diary of the Duke of Grafton: 'The good judgment of so young a man, who, not void of ambition on this trying occasion, could refuse this splendid offer, adds much to the lustre of the character he had acquired, for it was a temptation sufficient to have overset the resolution of most men.'

Meanwhile, though holding office only till the choice of his successor, Pitt found it requisite to bring in a measure which admitted no delay. It was necessary at the conclusion of peace to regulate in one way or other our commercial intercourse with North America. The views of Pitt upon this question were of the largest kind. He thought that the feelings of animosity produced by the war ought, as far as possible, to end with the war itself. He desired to treat the United States on points of commerce nearly as though they had been still dependent colonies. But many other members of weight, as Lord Sheffield and Mr. Eden, took a far more jealous view; and the measure which Pitt actually proposed was not a final, only a temporary Bill. Even thus it was, said Pitt, 'undoubtedly one of the most complicated in its nature, and at the same time one of the most extensive in its consequences, that ever had been submitted to Parliament.' It was a good deal discussed during the remainder of the Session. The Bill was several times committed and re-committed with a variety of amendments, and at last under the next administration was further altered by the Lords. It was no doubt a money Bill. 'But I am of opinion,' said Fox, 'that the order of the House respecting money Bills is often too strictly construed. . . . . It would be very absurd indeed to send a loan Bill to the Lords for their concurrence, and at the same time deprive them of the right of deliberation.'[1] At last there was passed a temporary Bill, merely vesting in the King, for a limited time, the power of regulation, and it afterwards came to be renewed from year to year.

Disappointed in Pitt, the King had next endeavoured to break the Coalition by appealing in the most earnest manner to Lord North to undertake the Government singly. Lord North again and again refused, and the King found it necessary to admit into his service both the Coalition chiefs. But the rival pretensions of their followers caused a new and well-nigh insuperable difficulty. At one moment it seemed probable that Fox and North would relinquish the task which they had assumed, and declare themselves unable to form the Government which they had announced. Fresh overtures to Pitt ensued.

The Lord Advocate to his brother.

Friday: (March) 21 (1783).
Five o'clock.

My dear Lord,—Last night the Duke of Portland waited upon the King, and informed him that he could not form an administration, he and Lord North having differed as to one particular. The King instantly sent for Mr. Pitt, and told him so. Mr. Pitt sent for me to come to him this morning at eight. I went and met the Duke of Rutland there. The result was that if they could not agree, and the country by that means (was) kept in anarchy, he would accept of the Government, and make an administration, which would indeed have been a strong one, himself at the head of it. But he insisted to have the secret kept, because he was determined to have it distinctly ascertained before going again to the King, that North and Fox, after making a profligate conjunction, had quarrelled among themselves about the division of the spoils. Mr. Pitt and the Duke of Rutland have this instant called at my house to inform me that the Coalition had again taken place, for that the Duke of Portland and Mr. Fox had yielded the point in dispute. The disputed point was whether Lord Stormont should be President of the Council. So I suppose we shall instantly have their arrangement published, and they will kiss hands on Monday. Yours, &c.,

H. Dundas.

The Lord Advocate to his brother.

March 24, 1783.

I went to Langley on Saturday, and at two this morning was called up by an express from Mr. Pitt. I have seen him this morning, and although I shall not be sanguine upon anything till it is actually fixed, I flatter myself Mr. Pitt will kiss hands as First Lord of the Treasury on Wednesday next.

The Lord Advocate to his brother.

March 25, 1783.

I have just time to write to you, that since yesterday I have altered my mind; and it is now my opinion that Mr. Pitt will not accept of the government. How all this anarchy is to end God only knows. Yours,

H. D.

The letters which passed, so late as the 24th, between the King and Mr. Pitt will be found with the rest of their correspondence at the close of the present volume. They evince how earnest was his Majesty in pressing, and how resolute the young statesman in continuing to decline, the highest political prize.

Thus for several weeks, at a most critical juncture of public affairs, was the country left without a Government. Murmurs began to rise on every side. In the House of Commons there had already been a motion reflecting on these delays by Mr. Coke of Norfolk, and another to the same effect was announced by the Earl of Surrey. Thus pressed, the Coalition did at last consent to coalesce. On the 31st of March, the very day which had been fixed for Lord Surrey's motion, Pitt rose in his place and announced that he had that day, with his Majesty's permission, resigned the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Lord Surrey, however, rose again and insisted on making his motion. After some debate he was induced to withdraw it, but declared that he should certainly bring it forward again in a few days unless a new administration was announced. He had no further delays to complain of, for on the 2nd of April the new Ministers kissed hands.

In the Cabinet thus formed, there was carried out the favourite idea of Fox, of a mere nominal headship of the Treasury; for the First Lord was declared to be His Grace of Portland. Under him were Fox and North as joint Secretaries of State, and with coequal authority, but far different shares of real power. The gentler spirit of Lord North was, on most occasions, content to yield, while under the wing of the Duke of Portland, Fox was in fact Prime Minister. Lord John Cavendish returned to the Exchequer, and Lord Keppel to the Admiralty. Lord Stormont was President, and Lord Carlisle Privy Seal. The Great Seal was put into commission, the King having striven in vain to keep Lord Thurlow in office. The new Cabinet, therefore, consisted of seven persons only.

An anxious wish had been felt to include Mr. Pitt in these Cabinet arrangements. His own intended successor, Lord John Cavendish, pressed him to resume the post of Chancellor of the Exchequer, intending in that case to take another office for himself. But Pitt would not listen to such overtures, nor consent to take any part in a combination of which he strongly disapproved.

In the appointments outside of the Cabinet, Burke returned to his old place of Paymaster, and Sheridan became Secretary of the Treasury. The Vice-Royalty of Ireland was bestowed on the Earl of Northington, son of the late Chancellor, and a friend of Fox; while a young man of the highest promise, William Windham, of Norfolk, went as Secretary. Lord Sandwich, with certainly a most tame submission to those who had once so bitterly arraigned him, consented to take the Rangership of St. James's and Hyde Parks; a post of no political importance, but to which at that time a large salary was joined.

The new Government being formed, and having entered on its duties, Fox, without hesitation, took the lead in the House of Commons. Indeed, it was in contemplation to call Lord North, by writ, to the House of Peers. But the idea, if not relinquished, was at least postponed.

Thus did the Coalition triumph—if indeed the word triumph can be used whenever power is attained through the sacrifice of fame. Even at the outset this 'unnatural alliance,' for so it was commonly termed, was rebuked with great bitterness in the House of Commons. There the bitterness might be in some measure mitigated by the admirable suavity of Lord North, and by the warm attachment of so many friends to Fox. But in the country there was no such counteraction. 'Unless a real good government is the consequence of this junction, nothing can justify it to the public;' such was the remark at the time of one of its main promoters.[1] And when Fox, on taking office, appealed to his old constituents at Westminster, he did indeed succeed in obtaining re-election, but the multitude received him with hootings and hissings, and his eloquent voice could not be heard.

Such was the public indignation. Nor yet did it quickly cool. On the contrary, it became more ardent when the Ministry formed by this alliance had been tried and been found to fail. A year later there were echoes from every part of England to the austere reproach against the Coalition, expressed by Mr. Wilberforce to the freeholders of Yorkshire. The Coalition, he said, was a progeny that partook of the vices of both its parents—the corruption of the one and the violence of the other.

Nor yet in present times have the ablest historical writers formed any very different opinion. Lord John Russell and Lord Macaulay might be suspected of some leaning to the views of Mr. Fox; yet both, unable to vindicate this fatal Coalition, have given judgment against it with perfect candour and fairness. Lord Macaulay, above all, treats as a mere empty pretext the ground that was urged by Fox for this alliance—his objections to the terms of peace. There is not, says Lord Macaulay, the slightest reason to believe that Fox, if he had remained in office, would have hesitated one moment about concluding a treaty on such conditions.

In the month that preceded the formation of the Fox and North Government, there had been several Parliamentary debates. Mr. Townshend had been called to the House of Lords, so that Mr. Pitt, during that period, was in name as well as fact the leader of the House of Commons. On the 31st of March, in the discussion which ensued after his announcement that he had finally resigned the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, he took occasion to explain the principles of his future course. 'I desire,' he said, 'to declare that I am unconnected with any party whatever. I shall keep myself reserved, and act with whichever side I think is acting right.'

Accordingly in the remainder of the Session, which was protracted till the middle of July, Pitt did not attend in his place as a mere party man. It also frequently happened that the charms of advancing summer drew him from the House of Commons to the villa of his friend Wilberforce at Wimbledon. 'Eliot, Arden, and I will be with you before curfew, and expect an early meal of peas and strawberries'—such is one of the notes at this period which Pitt wrote, and Wilberforce preserved. 'One morning'—so Wilberforce relates—'we found the fruits of Pitt's earlier rising in the careful sowing of the garden-beds with the fragments of a dress-hat with which Ryder had over night come down from the opera.'

How different, I may observe, the real Pitt of private life from him whom in the following year the authors of the 'Rolliad' portrayed! They make him even at the tea-table maintain his stately manner and his Parliamentary language.

> Pass muffins in Committee of Supply,
> And buttered toast amend by adding dry.

Here are some further extracts from Wilberforce's diary at this time: 'May 26th, House. I spoke. Dinner at Lord Advocate's; Mr. and Mrs. Johnstone, Thurlow, Pepper, Pitt. After the rest went we sat till six in the morning.—Sunday, July 6th, Wimbledon. Persuaded Pitt and Pepper to church.—July 11th, fine hot day. Went on water with Pitt and Eliot fishing. Came back, dined, walked evening. Eliot went home; Pitt stayed.'

Yet it must not be supposed that Pitt was neglecting his duty in the House of Commons. We find, for example, that he spoke in the debate upon the case of Powell and Bembridge—that painful case in which Burke, so greatly to the discredit of his judgment, had reinstated in office two clerks publicly accused (and one of whom was afterwards convicted) of defalcations in their accounts. And on two other occasions Mr. Pitt took not only an active but a leading part.

On the 7th of May Pitt brought forward for the second time the question of Parliamentary Reform. Now there was a specific plan comprised in three Resolutions. By the first the House was pledged to take measures for the better prevention both of bribery and expense at elections. The second Resolution provided that whenever in any borough the majority of voters should be convicted of gross corruption, the borough itself should be disfranchised, and the minority not so convicted should be entitled to vote for the county. By the third Resolution the knights of the shire were to be increased in number. This, as is well known, was the scheme of reform which Lord Chatham had suggested to the extent of one hundred new county members; but the third Resolution of Pitt further proposed an increase of representatives to the metropolis.

In the debate which ensued the new confederates and joint Secretaries of State took opposite sides, Fox warmly supporting, and Lord North with equal vehemence denouncing the scheme. It was their first public disagreement since their late alliance.

On the other hand Pitt obtained some aid from the ranks of his opponents on the last occasion. First there was Dundas, now become or becoming the closest of his friends. 'Last year,' said Dundas, 'I was against going into a Committee because there was no specific motion made; now I am for the motion because I think it a good one.' Much to the same effect spoke Thomas Pitt, but in the course of his speech he also referred to himself as the proprietor, or as it was then termed the 'patron,' of the borough of Old Sarum. This he said he was willing to surrender into the hands of Parliament as a free sacrifice, as a victim to be offered up at the shrine of the British Constitution. Should the victim be accepted, he would suggest that the power of returning two members might be transferred to the Bank of England.

It must have been diverting as the debate of that night proceeded to contrast the liberal offer of Thomas Pitt with the anti-reforming zeal of the Right Hon. Richard Rigby. In his ardour for the close boroughs Mr. Rigby rose to declare that he would rather see another member added to Old Sarum, where there was but a single house, than another member to the City of London, which had members enough already.

On dividing, the Resolutions of Pitt, notwithstanding the accession to his ranks of Dundas and his kinsman Thomas, were rejected by a very large majority, the numbers being 293 and 149. The result shows how rightly Pitt had judged in the more general terms of his motion of last year.

On the 2nd of June Pitt produced some of the fruits of his labours at the Treasury. He brought in a Bill for the Reform of Abuses in the Public Offices. He hoped, as he said, to effect a saving of at least 40,000*l.* a-year, and on going into Committee on the 17th he gave some striking proofs of the abuses which prevailed. Thus, in the article of stationery, for which the annual charge was 18,000*l.*, he said, 'I believe I shall somewhat astonish the Noble Lord in the blue riband (Lord North), when I tell the House and inform him, for I really believe the Noble Lord had no idea of any such circumstance, that the Noble Lord alone, as chief of the Treasury, cost the public the year before the last no less than 1,300*l.* for stationery. One article of the bill is 340*l.* for pack thread alone!'

Lord North, whose own upright and disinterested character is beyond all question, rose in his own defence. 'I had given,' he said, 'the most positive direction that no stationery ware should be delivered for my use without the express order of my private secretary. If, therefore any fraud has been committed, it must have been by a breach of this direction. I assure the House that I will make a most rigorous inquiry into this business, and if I find delinquency, I will leave nothing in my power undone to bring the delinquents to punishment. . . . As to coals and candles, I found when I was placed at the head of the Treasury that my predecessors had been supplied with those articles at the expense of the public, and that it was according to an old and established custom. But I declined to avail myself of this custom, and I have supplied my house with coals and candles at my own expense.' The vindication of Lord North personally was no doubt complete, but still from some other quarter the gross abuse, the wanton loss to the public, remained.

The conduct of the Coalition Ministers in regard to this Bill was certainly not creditable to them. They did not venture to divide the House of Commons against it in any of its stages, but when it reached the House of Lords they put forth all their influence, and caused the Bill to be rejected upon the second reading.

The little that has passed in the world since we parted you know already as well, I believe, as I can tell you ; for nothing has occurred in which I know anything more than all the rest of the world. Politics have been tolerably quiet, which for the present is, I think, much the best. In the two circumstances of the loan, and the restoration of Mr. Powell, our new Ministry have given a pretty fair opening, if it were the time to seize it. The latter business must still produce some further discussion, and probably a good deal to their discredit; but the Session is now so far advanced that probably nothing very material will happen in the House of Commons. What may happen out of it any day there is no knowing. The same fixed aversion, I believe, still continues ; you will easily guess where. My defeat on the Parliamentary Reform was much more complete than I expected. Still, if the question was to be lost, the discussion has not been without its use. Business of some sort or other will probably keep Parliament sitting through most of the next month at least. I have not been able yet to arrange the whole of my summer plan with any certainty, but undoubtedly Burton will never be left out of it.

The scene in Albemarle Street has been carried on from day to day till it is full time it should end. I rather hope it will be happily completed very soon, though it has lasted so long already that it may still last longer than seems likely.

I hope you are gradually able to enjoy more of the beauties round you, and of this delightful weather. Delightful as it is, if it continues, even the moors will begin to complain. The dust of this part of the world is almost insufferable.

May 24, 1783.

I hardly need tell you how much the division about Powell and Bembridge has exposed the weakness of Ministry, and added to their disgrace. To rub through the remains of the Session seems almost as much as they can expect, all things considered.

May 28, 1783.

I am just going to the House of Commons on East India business, which is not the most entertaining. The Budget has, as you have seen, given us some more debate. I was induced, from Fox's language, to mark pretty strongly that I was not disposed always to stand quite on the defensive; and the effect of attacking him, not very civilly, was, that he took more pains afterwards to be civil to me than I ever knew when we were friends.

During the last six weeks of the Session the members of Parliament were as usual beginning to disperse, and the Ministers seemed to be perfectly secure; yet at that very time they were contending with a serious danger, and their government was in their opinion near its close.

The cause of this new entanglement was George Prince of Wales, afterwards King George the Fourth. In his education he had received from his Royal parents an excellent example of a moral life, but he had by no means adopted that example as his own. On the contrary, as Horace Walpole once remarked, he came forth from that Temple of Virtue, his father's palace, as though he had been brought up in a cider-cellar. Plunging headlong into a career of extravagance and dissipation, he eagerly attached himself to Fox as his familiar friend; and it may readily be supposed that this association was far from tending to conciliate the King either to the great Whig orator or to the giddy young Prince.

Born in August, 1762, the Prince was now within a few weeks of his majority. It became necessary to consider, without delay, the question of a separate establishment for His Royal Highness. Mr. Fox proposed to apply to Parliament for a grant of 100,000*l.* a-year. Lord North and Lord John Cavendish, although they thought the amount extravagant, acquiesced; but the King felt objection both to the largeness of the sum and to the independence of parental control which that vote would imply. In place of it he offered to allow 50,000*l.* a year from his Civil list.

For some time neither side would yield. The King, as usual with him, was firm and unbending in his own opinion, and the Ministers considered themselves bound by their promise to the Prince of Wales. The notes of His Royal Highness to Fox, pending this negotiation, are still preserved: they begin with the friendly prefix of 'Dear Charles.' In the middle of June Fox and his colleagues looked upon their dismissal or resignation as close at hand, and they wrote accordingly to their friends at Dublin Castle.

It so chanced that at this very juncture Earl Temple arrived in London from his recent Lord Lieutenancy, and, as a matter of course on such occasions, had an audience of the Sovereign. His Majesty seized the opportunity to consult his late Viceroy. He expressed himself as much incensed at the pretensions put forth on behalf of his son, and as greatly inclined on that account to dismiss his Ministers. Lord Temple, however, though one of the keenest of party men, had sagacity enough to see that here neither the juncture nor yet the pretext would be favourable, and he strongly advised the King to await a better time.

On the other hand, His Royal Highness of Wales being assured that he should not be able to prevail in his pretension, was induced to release his friends from their engagement. With a calmer temper on each side, the business was soon adjusted. It was determined that the King should allow the Prince 50,000*l*. yearly from his Civil List, and that the House of Commons should be asked to grant the sum of 60,000*l*. as an outfit to His Royal Highness. A message on this subject to the Commons was brought down by Lord John Cavendish on the 23rd of June, and on a subsequent day the sum proposed was most cheerfully voted. The Prince was thus provided with what seemed to be an adequate establishment, and on the meeting of Parliament in the November following he took his seat in the House of Lords.

It does not appear that Mr. Pitt was in any manner consulted in this affair, though no doubt he must have been fully apprised of it in subsequent conversations with Lord Temple. Unconnected with public affairs there was an event at the same period which afforded him great pleasure. His brother, Lord Chatham, had become attached to the Hon. Mary Elizabeth Townshend, a daughter of his friend Lord Sydney. For upwards of a year had the young Earl continued his attentions; but with the procrastination that through life formed a main feature of his character, it was not until June, 1783, that he brought them to a point. The offer being made and accepted, was a source of much joy to Lady Chatham, to whom we find Mr. Pitt write in terms of affectionate congratulation:—

Saturday, June 14, 1783.

My dear Mother,—I know too well your feelings on the happy news you have received, and you, I trust, know too well how much my feelings are your own, to make words of congratulation necessary between us; and yet I have had my pen in my hand several times, though I have been as often interrupted, and I can now hardly imagine how so many days have passed away without my employing it on this subject. You have, I am sure, easily imagined, though not so near a spectator, how much joy the long-expected declaration produced. Lord Sydney is the happiest person in the world—at least two excepted—and is delighted with your answer to his letter. I cannot learn with any certainty when the union is likely to be completed; but as there are not many materials for the law's delay, I imagine it cannot be long.

Lord Temple came to town yesterday, and made his appearance at St. James's, where I met him. You will not be surprised that he was received in the most gracious manner possible. I have had since a great deal of conversation with him, and in all respects of the most satisfactory sort. Our economical and reforming Ministry will probably take another opportunity of showing their sincerity on Tuesday, on a Bill for remedying the abuses in several public offices. The establishment for the Prince of Wales is also to come on that day or the next. Rumour says strange things of it. The proposers probably expect to make their account by it, but they will lose in the nation more than they gain elsewhere.

I am almost too late for dinner, even though at the Duke of Rutland's. Adieu. Your ever dutiful

W. PITT.

The marriage thus agreed upon was solemnised on the 10th of July, and the happy pair went to pass the honeymoon at Hayes. There soon afterwards they received a visit from their brother William.

No children were born of this marriage. The second Countess of Chatham died in 1821, and the title was extinct at the decease of the second Earl in 1835.

Besides his excursion to Hayes, Pitt made also a visit at Stowe, which, from his description of it to his mother, he appears never to have seen before. He next proceeded to Brighton in company with Mr. Pretyman, and towards the middle of August joined Lady Chatham at Burton Pynsent.

Savile Street[1]: July 22, 1783.

My dear Mother,—I resume at last my pen, though with no other reason than ought to have made me do so every day for this month past. I can indeed hardly make out how that period has slid away, in which I have done little else but ride backwards and forwards between Wimbledon and London, and meditate plans for the summer, until I find the summer half over before I have begun to put any in execution.

My excursion to Stowe was a very short one—the pleasantest, however, that could be. I found more beauties in the place than I expected; and the house, though not half finished in the inside, the most magnificent by far that I ever saw. Still, as far as the mere pleasure of seeing goes, I had rather be the visitor than the owner. Sedgemoor and Troy Hill are not to be exchanged for the Elysian Fields, with all the temples into the bargain. I had the discretion, you will believe though, to keep this opinion to myself. We were quite a family party—Mr. and Mrs. Fortescue, Miss Grenville, William, and myself. We had leisure, as you may imagine, for abundance of speculation and discourse, all of which was in the greatest degree satisfactory, and promises everything that you would wish in regard to those quarters. The Session is over, and everything seems very quiet, though whether the Ministry will gain much strength from their repose is very doubtful. Perhaps not. I rather think, if I can, to take leave of this neighbourhood in a day or two, and to take some dips at Brighthelmstone before our Somersetshire party, which I hope will take place not very late in next month, if nothing happens any day to derange my summer schemes. I came this morning from Hayes, where all is happiness, as you will believe, and where indeed all ought to be so. I should be very much tempted to stay there till they move, but that I want to employ a few more studious hours in the interval than I could easily find there. Brighthelmstone will answer in that view, as well as in point of health, though, as to that, it cannot make me better than I am. . . . . . Ever your dutiful and affectionate

W. PITT.

Brighthelmstone: Aug. 8, 1783.

My dear Mother,—I imagine some of your visitors are by this time with you, or at least on their way. I am so far separated from the main army that they may probably not be able to give you any certain account of my motions, though it is my intention very soon to rejoin it. I shall leave this place probably on Wednesday, and by striking across the country shall, I flatter myself, reach Burton the next day. At all events, before the end of the week, I shall certainly have the happiness of seeing you, and, I trust, of finding you going on well. This part of the world supplies no news, and I know of none elsewhere. By all I learnt before I left London, I now think things may possibly go through the rest of the summer as they are, though much longer there is every reason to believe they will not.

Ever, my dear Mother, &c., W. PITT.

CHAPTER IV.

Pitt's excursion to France—Abbé de Lageard—Return to England—Fox's India Bill—Great speech of Burke—Bill passes the Commons, but is thrown out by the Lords—Dismissal of Fox and North—The Royal Prerogative—Pitt appointed Prime Minister—Resignation of Lord Temple—The New Cabinet.

His legal pursuits being for this summer laid aside, Pitt had planned an excursion to France, in company with Wilberforce and Eliot. Early in September the three friends met and passed a few days at the seat of Henry Bankes in Dorsetshire. There one day in partridge-shooting Pitt had a narrow escape from Wilberforce's gun. 'So at least,' said Wilberforce, 'my companions affirmed, with a roguish wish perhaps to make the most of my short-sightedness and inexperience in field-sports.'

On the 10th of September Pitt attended the King's Levee at St. James's, and on the 12th embarked at Dover with his two travelling companions. But the events of his short tour will best be gathered from his own correspondence.

Sept. 10, 1783.

My dear Mother,—I am just going to the Levee, and shall get into my chaise immediately after, and, I hope, shall reach Dover before night. I will write as soon as I am landed on the other side of the water. London furnishes no news but the long expected definitive treaty, and of that no new particulars are known. I hope you are perfectly free from the complaint Harriot mentioned in her last letter. If the cross-post does me justice, she will have heard from me in answer. Adieu. Ever, my dear mother, &c.,

W. Pitt.

Calais: Sept. 12 (1783).

My dear Mother,—Lest any howling at Burton should have given you the idea of a storm, I am impatient to assure you that we are arrived here after rather a rough but a very prosperous passage. We shall set out to-morrow and reach Rheims Sunday night or Monday morning. A letter, directed to a Gentilhomme Anglois à la Poste Restante, will, I find, be sure to reach me. I hope I shall have the pleasure of hearing from you very soon.

Your dutiful and affectionate W. PITT.

Rheims: Sept. 18, Thursday, 1783.

My dear Mother,—We arrived here after a journey which had little but the novelty of the country to recommend it. The travelling was much better than I expected, and the appearance of the people more comfortable, but the face of the country through all the way from Calais the dullest I ever saw. Here we are in very good quarters, though as yet we have not found much society but our own. The place is chiefly inhabited by mercantile people and ecclesiastics, among whom, however, I suppose we shall by degrees find some charitable persons who will let us practise our French upon them. At present, when I have told you that we are here and perfectly well, I have exhausted my whole budget of news. The post is also not well suited for a longer letter, as it goes out at nine in the morning, and I am writing before breakfast. This, however, is not so great an exertion as in England, for the hours are uncommonly early, to which we easily accustom ourselves, at night, and in some measure in the morning. I hope I shall have the happiness of a letter from Burton soon. You will probably have received one which I wrote from Calais. Kind love to Harriot, and compliments to Mrs. Stapleton.

Your ever dutiful and affectionate W. PITT.

To Lady Harriot Pitt.

Rheims: Oct. 1, 1783.

My dear Sister,

. . . .

This place has for some days been constantly improving upon us, though at this time of year it has not a numerous society. We are going to-day to dine at a country house in the midst of vineyards, which, as this is the height of the vintage, will furnish a very pleasant scene. To-morrow we are to dine at a magnificent palace of the Archbishop's, who lives about five miles off, and is a sort of prince in this country. Most of those we see are ecclesiastics, and as a French Abbé is not proverbial for silence, we have an opportunity of hearing something of the language. . . .

Your ever affectionate W. PITT.

To Lady Chatham.

Rheims: Monday, Oct. 6, 1783.

This will be the last time of my writing from this place, which we leave on Wednesday for Paris. The time has passed not unpleasantly or unprofitably, and I flatter myself has furnished a stock of French that will last for ten days or a fortnight at Paris. We shall arrive there on Thursday, and do not mean to be tempted by anything to prolong our stay much beyond the 20th of October. Parliament I hear meets on the 11th of November, and a fortnight or three weeks in England first is very desirable.

The direction I sent became, from my manner of expressing it, more mysterious than I meant, as I had no intention to leave out my name. It is some proof of French politeness that they do not bear it any enmity, though they seem to know the difference between this war and the last. I believe you may venture to direct to me at full length at Paris, adding Hôtel du Parc Royal, Rue du Colombier, Faubourg St. Germain.

Hôtel de Grande Bretagne, Paris:
Wednesday, Oct. 15 (1783).

I am just setting out to Fontainebleau for two or three days, where I shall find the Court and all the magnificence of France, and with this expedition I shall finish my career here. Since I have been here I have had little to do but to see sights, as the King's journey to Fontainebleau has carried all the world from Paris except the English, who seem quite in possession of the town.

Some further details have been preserved of this, the only visit to the continent which Pitt ever made. Nearly all are derived from the letters and the Diary as published of Mr. Wilberforce. At Rheims Pitt had many conversations with Abbé de Lageard, a highly intelligent gentleman, then the Archbishop's delegate, and afterwards an emigrant in England. One day as the young orator was expressing in warm terms his admiration of the political system which prevailed at home, the Abbé asked him, since all human things were perishable, in what part the British Constitution might be first expected to decay? Pitt mused for a moment, and then answered:—'The part of our Constitution which will first perish is the prerogative of the King, and the authority of the House of Peers.'

'I am much surprised,' said the Abbé, 'that a country so moral as England can submit to be governed by such a spendthrift and such a rake as Fox: it seems to show that you are less moral than you claim to be.' 'The remark is just,' Pitt replied, 'but you have not been under the wand of the magician.'

On the French institutions they also sometimes conversed. Pitt made many careful inquiries, and summed up his impressions in the following words:—'Sir, you have no political liberty; but as to civil liberty you have more of it than you suppose.' It is remarkable that this is the very conclusion which, in treating of that period seventy years afterwards, the last work of De Tocqueville has with so much force of argument maintained.

But, besides these well attested replies of Pitt in France, there is another resting on no good authority; a mere silly rumour which has often been repeated. We are told that Monsieur and Madame Necker, through the intervention of Horace Walpole, proposed to him their daughter in marriage, with a fortune of 14,000*l.* a year, and that Pitt answered,—'I am already married to my country.'[1] Now, in the first place, Horace Walpole was not then, and had not been for many years, at Paris. Secondly, it is most improbable that Monsieur and Madame Necker, strongly imbued as they were with the Swiss ideas of domestic happiness, should have offered their child as the wife of a young foreigner after only a few days' acquaintance. And thirdly, the theatrical reply ascribed to Pitt is wholly at variance with his ever plain and manly, and sometimes sarcastic, style. I believe that he never had the opportunity of refusing Mademoiselle Necker, but if he did I am sure that it was not in any such melo-dramatic phrase.

At Fontainebleau we find Pitt take part in the chase. Wilberforce dots down in his journal:—'October 17, morning: Pitt stag-hunting, Eliot and I in chaise to see King. Clumsy, strange figure in immense boots. Dined at home; then play.' Both at Fontainebleau and at Paris the son of Chatham was much noticed by persons of distinction, from the Queen, Marie Antoinette, downwards. 'They all, men and women'—so writes Wilberforce to Bankes—'crowded round Pitt in shoals; and he behaved with great spirit, though he was sometimes a little bored when they talked to him of Parliamentary Reform.'

The three friends landed again at Dover on the 24th of October. Mr. Pitt, as we learn from Bishop Tomline, who despatches his tour in a single sentence, returned to England with the intention of resuming his profession of the law, if there should appear a fair probability of the administration being permanent. But the events of the coming Session speedily dispelled his legal dreams.

Pitt was full of Parliamentary topics, when a few days after his return he wrote as follows to Lord Mahon:—

Berkeley Square, Nov. 3, 1783.

My dear Lord,—I was in hopes to have seen you and those with you at Chevening, all of whom I wished extremely to see before this time, but I have had so much to do ever since I have been in town that I have found it impossible. The meeting is now so near that time is every day more precious, and there is abundance of objects that require examination. I trust you will be in town in a very few days, for there are several things in which I am quite at a loss without you. If anything detains you, pray let me know, and I will endeavour to meet you at Hayes, but I rather trust to seeing you here. Adieu.

Ever most affectionately yours, W. PITT.

Parliament met on the 11th of November. On that day Pitt spoke, admitting that there was no objection to the Address proposed. On the same day he addressed to Lady Chatham a few hasty lines:—

Berkeley Square, Nov. 11, 1783.

My dear Mother,—I have been disappointed the two last posts in my intention of writing to you, which, just as the meeting of Parliament approached, you will, I am sure, readily excuse. We have to-day heard the King's Speech, and voted the Address without any opposition. Both were so general that they prove nothing of what may be expected during the Session. The East India business and the funds promise to make the two principal objects. I am afraid it will not be easy for me by the post to be anything else than a fashionable correspondent, for I believe the fashion which prevails of opening almost every letter that is sent, makes it almost impossible to write anything worth reading. . . . Adieu, my dear Mother.

In the course of the debate on the Address Mr. Secretary Fox announced that in a week from that time he should bring forward the great Ministerial measure for the government of India, which was foreshadowed in the Royal Speech. To that measure, almost in exclusion of every other, the public attention was now directed.

The progress of our Eastern empire under Warren Hastings, as its rise under Clive, displayed amidst all its greatness and its glory some flagrant cases of oppression and misrule. Echoes of these, though faint, had gradually rolled across the wide expanse of sea. Inquiry and suspicion began to be rife in England. Committees of the House of Commons had sat and had reported. By the witnesses examined the cases of oppression were in part revealed. By the voice of eloquent speakers – of Dundas especially and Burke—the oppressor still in office was denounced.

So recently as April, 1783, on the fall of the Shelburne administration, Dundas had brought in a Bill on this most important subject. His plan was to send out a new Governor-General, prepared to remedy abuses and armed with extensive powers, with authority to overrule, if he thought it needful, the wish and the opinion of his council. In such a case, as Dundas had observed, everything would depend on the weight and authority of the person so selected; and as the fittest person, Dundas had named Earl Cornwallis.

Under such circumstances the Coalition Government had scarce an alternative before it. The Ministers did no more than any other Ministers at that period must and would have done in undertaking to frame a measure that should reform the entire administration of our Indian provinces.

From the profound knowledge of Burke upon all branches of this subject it has been commonly supposed that, in framing the new measure, he had by far the largest share. This conjecture has been confirmed by the subsequent publication of his papers. 'From Mr. Pigot, who finished the India Bill from my drafts'—such is the endorsement, in Burke's own handwriting, to a letter which he received in October, 1783.[1] There can be no doubt, however, that Burke, before he sent in his measure to the Cabinet, consulted Fox on every point of importance, and that Fox applied himself to the whole subject with most anxious care.

The India Bill, prepared by these two eminent statesmen and agreed to by their Cabinet colleagues, was of a bold and sweeping character. It gave to a Board of seven persons—all charters or vested rights notwithstanding—the absolute power to appoint or displace the holders of office in India, and to conduct as they deemed best the entire administration of that country. The names of these seven persons were left in blank to be filled up in the Committee, and their authority was to endure for four years from the passing of the Act, whatever changes of administration might meanwhile ensue. The members of the Board were prohibited from the use of the ballot or any other mode of secret voting, and they were required to lay their accounts before both Houses at the beginning of every Session.

It would be great injustice to the memory of both Burke and Fox were we to doubt that in their deliberations the advantage of India and the cause of justice and good policy were the foremost objects of their thoughts. Burke showed on many occasions an eager, nay a passionate anxiety for the welfare of the Indian people, and Fox was never wanting in a generous sympathy with every form of suffering and distress. Nor is it to be denied that several arguments might be pleaded in favour of the project they proposed. Was it not most desirable to shield those distant provinces from the vicissitudes of party conflict at home, and to obtain a clear field for the needed improvements and reforms?

But, while we may readily admit that the benefit of India itself was the main object with Fox when he devised or adopted his celebrated India Bill, some of his warmest admirers have been willing to acknowledge that he also allowed considerable weight to the future interests and influence of his own party friends in England.[1] He saw that the King had most unwillingly admitted them to office: he saw that His Majesty might at any moment turn them out. How useful, then, if they might construct for themselves some safe citadel of refuge independent of the Royal smiles! How useful if, concentrating in sure hands and during a fixed term of years the entire administration of India, they might confront the Treasury with a mass of patronage scarcely inferior to its own![1] Could the King hope to make head against such a combination? Would it not probably avert or certainly baffle any overt act of his disfavour?

While thus urged forward, first by public and in the second place by personal motives, Fox was by no means insensible to the perils that he ran. 'It will be vigorous and hazardous.' In these words do we find him describe his own measure in a confidential letter of the time.[2] But his nature was ever bold and fearless, and the prize glittered bright before him. On the 18th of November, according to the notice he had given, he rose to explain to the House of Commons the provisions of the Bill. He fixed the second reading for the 27th of the same month, a time that was complained of as far too early; but Pitt, who rose immediately after him, could obtain no further delay.

The speeches of Fox, both in opening and defending this momentous measure, have been acknowledged on all hands as most lucid and able. 'Such eloquence,' said his great rival, 'would lend a grace to deformity.' On one point only, that is, on the violation of the Charters, Fox, as addressing an assembly jealous of vested rights, may have faltered in his tone. For this violation he could merely urge, in general terms, the plea of necessity. But necessity—as Pitt exclaimed with indignation, on the very first day of the Bill—'necessity is the argument of tyrants, it is the creed of slaves!'

During the interval between the introduction of the Bill and its second reading we find Pitt write as follows to his friend the Duke of Rutland:—

[2] To the Earl of Northington at Dublin, Nov. 7, 1783.

Berkeley Square, Nov. 22, 1783.

My dear Duke,

. . . .

We are in the midst of a contest, and, I think, approaching to a crisis. The Bill which Fox has brought in relative to India will be, one way or other, decisive for or against the Coalition. It is, I really think, the boldest and most unconstitutional measure ever attempted, transferring at one stroke, in spite of all charters and compacts, the immense patronage and influence of the East to Charles Fox, in or out of office. I think it will with difficulty, if at all, find its way through our House, and can never succeed in yours. Ministry trust all on this one die, and will probably fail. They have hurried on the Bill so fast, that we are to have the second reading on Thursday next, November 27th. I think we shall be strong on that day, but much stronger in the subsequent stages. If you have any member within fifty or a hundred miles of you who cares for the Constitution or the country, pray send him to the House of Commons as quick as you can. . . . .

Ever most faithfully yours, W. PITT.

For fear of mistakes, I must tell you that I am at a house which my brother has taken here, and not at Shelburne House.

I do not see Lord Tyrconnel in town, nor Pochin, nor Sir Henry Peyton. Can you apply to any of them? They may still be in time for some of the stages of the Bill.

Notwithstanding the strongest muster that the Opposition was able to make, the second reading of the India Bill was carried by a majority of 229 to 120. The struggle was resumed in its succeeding stages, with no great gain as to numbers, but with some splendid eloquence all through on either side. Pitt, especially, put forth all his powers, and, stripling as he might be termed, he shone forth no unworthy antagonist to the riper genius of Fox. Henceforth these two great orators, high above the common level, might confront each other—it is a poet's thought—like two vast mountains, parted by the main.

> We, we have seen the intellectual race
> Of giants stand like Titans face to face:
> Athos and Ida, with a dashing sea
> Of eloquence between.[1]

These debates are further memorable for one of the great speeches of Burke—one of those great speeches which contemporaries might hear with indifference, but which the latest posterity will admire and revere. On this occasion he most happily applied to Fox some lines in Silius Italicus, prophetic through an ancestor in the Punic Wars of Cicero—'the only person to whose eloquence it does not wrong that of the mover of the Bill to be compared.'

> Indole proh quantâ juvenis, quantumque daturus
> Ausoniæ populis venturum in sæcula civem;
> Ille super Gangem, super exauditus et Indos
> Implebit terras voce, et furialia bella
> Fulmine compescet linguæ.[2]

Of late years I have heard Lord Macaulay more than once refer to this passage, and observe how many persons he has known to misunderstand it—failing to catch the allusion to Cicero—and supposing from a hasty persual or an imperfect recollection that the lines are 'somewhere in Virgil,' as, indeed, they are a manifest and successful imitation of the Virgilian manner.

In the same most beautiful passage Burke dwells on the merits of Fox with affectionate regard: 'He is traduced and abused for his supposed motives. He will remember that obloquy is a necessary ingredient in the composition of all true glory; he will remember that it was not only in the Roman customs, but it is in the nature and constitution of things, that calumny and abuse are essential parts of triumph. . . . . He is now on a great eminence, where the eyes of mankind are turned to him. He may live long, he may do much; but here is the summit,—he never can exceed what he does this day. . . . . He has faults, but they are faults that, though they may in a small degree tarnish the lustre and sometimes impede the march of his abilities, have nothing in them to extinguish the fire of great virtues. In these faults there is no mixture of deceit, of hypocrisy, of pride, of ferocity, of complexional despotism, or want of feeling for the distresses of mankind. His are faults which might exist in a descendant of Henry the Fourth of France, as they did exist in that father of his country.'

[1] Lord Byron, in the Age of Bronze. Some preceding lines give the application of the passage to Pitt and Fox.

[2] Sil. Italic., lib. viii. v. 407.

The descent of Mr. Fox from Henri Quatre, which Burke here indicates, may perplex some readers quite as much as the passage from Silius Italicus. They must remember that Mr. Fox's mother was a daughter of the Duke of Richmond; that the Dukes of Richmond are sprung by the Bend Sinister from Charles the Second; and that Charles the Second was, on the maternal side, a grandson of the fourth Henry.

In these debates two lawyers of rising fame—of opposite politics, but each destined to attain the height of his profession—made their maiden speeches. First, there was John Scott, in after years Lord Eldon. Having been returned in the previous June for a small borough through the Thynne family interest, he was called by his adversaries at this time 'Lord Weymouth's lawyer.' His first speech was but a slight one, though eliciting some compliments from Fox. His next effort appears to have been, as his biographer describes it, 'vastly more ambitious than successful.'[1] Quoting several verses from the Book of Revelation, he alleged the beast with seven heads and ten horns as an emblem of the awful innovation designed in the affairs of the East India Company; and he further garnished his oratory with a citation of the tragic fate of Desdemona. In reply he was severely lashed by Sheridan, and could receive but scant congratulation from his friends; but his mortification at the moment led, beyond all doubt, to his ultimate advantage. It induced him ever afterwards to renounce such soaring flights, and to place, as he well might, his reliance on his legal ability and learning and his great judicial powers.

Erskine also spoke for the first time in these debates. A seat had been found for him at Portsmouth, and he took his seat on the 11th of November. Not a week elapsed ere he rose to address the House. There was great eagerness to hear him, and the highest expectation derived from his wonderful successes at the Bar. But deep in proportion was the disappointment that ensued. Here, as derived from an eye-witness, is a graphic representation of the scene:—'Pitt, evidently intending to reply, sat with pen and paper in his hand, prepared to catch the arguments of this formidable adversary. He wrote a word or two. Erskine proceeded, but with every additional sentence Pitt's attention to the paper relaxed, his look became more careless, and he obviously began to think the orator less and less worthy of his attention. At length, while every eye in the House was fixed upon him, with a contemptuous smile he dashed the pen through the papers and flung them on the floor. Erskine never recovered from this expression of disdain; his voice faltered, he struggled through the remainder of his speech, and sank into his seat dispirited and shorn of his fame.' A discussion is said to have arisen at the time whether Pitt's pantomimic display of contempt was premeditated, or arose from the feeling of the moment; but Lord Campbell, as the biographer of Erskine, inclines to the latter opinion.[1]

There is still in these debates another legal speech to be commemorated. The Attorney-General, John Lee, was seeking to repel the charge founded on the abrogation of the Charters; but he did so in terms which greatly added to the popular excitement that prevailed. 'For what,' cried Mr. Lee, 'is a Charter? Only a skin of parchment with a seal of wax dangling at one end of it.' He had added, 'when compared with the happiness of thirty millions of subjects.' But in such cases modifications and qualifications are of little avail; the hostile echoes out of doors repeat only the obnoxious words.

[1] Lives of the Chancellors, vol. vi. p. 416. It should be noted, however, that the meagre Parliamentary History of that day (though here no doubt in error) represents Erskine as speaking, not before Pitt, but immediately after him (vol. xxiii. p. 1245).

In the Committee Fox filled up the blank space with the names of the Directors he proposed. First there was Earl Fitzwilliam, who was designed as Chairman of the Board. He was a man not as yet generally known, but highly respected in his private character, 'whom,' thus writes Horace Walpole, 'the Cavendishes are nursing up as a young Octavius, to succeed his uncle Rockingham.'[1] Next was George, eldest son of Lord North. All the rest were of the same complexion, staunch and tried friends of the new Administration. There was not even in one case the pretence of an impartial choice; there was not the smallest doubt that the new Board thus composed would be wholly at the bidding of Fox, whether in or out of office.

On the 8th of December the India Bill finally passed the Commons, by a majority of 208 against 102. On the 9th it was carried up to the Peers by Fox, as in triumph, attended by a great concourse of members. The Duke of Portland fixed the second reading for the 15th, but the indignation of several Peers could not be so long restrained. Earl Temple started up at once, happy, he said, to seize the first opportunity of entering his solemn protest against so infamous a Bill. The words of Lord Thurlow, who followed, were much more weighty and almost as vehement. 'As I abhor tyranny in all its shapes,' said the late Chancellor, 'I shall oppose most strenuously this strange attempt to destroy the true balance of our Constitution. I wish to see the Crown great and respectable, but if the present Bill should pass, it will be no longer worthy of a man of honour to wear.' In using these words, Lord Thurlow looked full at the Prince of Wales, who was present, and he thus proceeded: 'The King will, in fact, take the diadem from his own head, and place it on the head of Mr. Fox.'

These two Peers did not confine themselves to speeches in Parliament. They had for some time been acting in close concert together, and they had drawn up a joint memorandum for the King. This memorandum, after remaining secret for many years, was published so recently as 1853, with other papers from Stowe.[1] It is thus endorsed in Lord Temple's own hand: 'Delivered by Lord Thurlow, on December 1, 1783.' We find it convey the strongest warning against the India Bill in progress as 'a plan to take more than half the Royal power, and by that means disable His Majesty for the rest of the reign.' Such a warning could not fail to make the strongest impression on the King, falling in as it did with his own political feelings, and coming from two statesmen, one of whom had been lately his Lord Chancellor, and the other his Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

But could the danger be still averted? This was a question which the memorandum did not leave without a reply. It suggested that the India Bill could be thrown out in the House of Lords; but it added that the result might be doubtful 'if those whose duty to His Majesty would excite them to appear, are not acquainted with his wishes, which would make it impossible to pretend a doubt of it.'

In the further progress of this transaction, Thurlow appears with much prudence to have kept in the background, and allowed the less wary Temple to take the lead. It may be said, indeed, that Thurlow acted the part of Bertrand, and Temple the part of Raton, in the well-known French fable.

[1] See the Courts and Cabinets of George the Third, vol. i. p. 288.

On the 11th of December the Earl asked for and obtained a private audience of the King. This is the interview described with so much spirit in that excellent satire, the 'Rolliad:'

> On that great day when Buckingham, by pairs,
> Ascended, Heaven-impelled, the King's back stairs,
> And panting, breathless, strained his lungs to show
> From Fox's Bill what mighty ills would flow;
> Still, as with stammering tongue he told his tale,
> Unusual terrors Brunswick's heart assail,
> Wide starts his white wig from the Royal ear,
> And each particular hair stands stiff with fear!

In this audience it appears that Lord Temple urged the King to use his Royal influence against the Bill, and that the King consented. To remove all doubt upon this point, a card was written, apparently in the King's own hand, stating that 'His Majesty allowed Earl Temple to say that whoever voted for the India Bill was not only not his friend, but would be considered by him as an enemy; and if these words were not strong enough, Earl Temple might use whatever words he might deem stronger and more to the purpose.' There may be some doubt as to the exact words of this commission, but as to its purport and its meaning none.

Such a commission was at that time especially significant. At that time there sat in Parliament no inconsiderable number of persons who professed for His Majesty either a personal attachment or a political adherence, and who were known by the common designation of 'King's friends.' In the Commons the leader of this band on all occasions was Mr. Charles Jenkinson, in later years Lord Hawkesbury, and finally Earl of Liverpool. In the Lords they seem to have had no regular chief; but any Peer inclining to their sentiments would of course attach the greatest weight to the commission of Lord Temple.

But that commission could not from its very nature remain a secret; it had to be made known to many of the Peers. Those who yielded to it might be willing to keep silence, but those who were determined to stand firm divulged it as of course to their political friends. On the 15th, when the Bill was again before the House, and when Counsel at the Bar were heard against it, the many rumours already rife upon the subject were noticed vaguely by the Duke of Portland, and in more pointed terms by the Duke of Richmond. Earl Temple rose in reply. 'That His Majesty,' he said, 'has recently honoured me with a conference is a matter of notoriety. It is not what I wish to deny, or have the power to conceal. It is the privilege of the Peers, as the hereditary counsellors of the Crown, either individually or collectively, to advise His Majesty. I did give my advice; what it was, I shall not now declare; it is lodged in His Majesty's breast. But though I will not declare what my advice to my Sovereign was, I will tell your Lordships negatively what it was not: it was not friendly to the principle and object of the Bill.'

The effects of this advice, or rather of the commission which resulted from it, were, however, apparent that same evening. A motion of adjournment being made, was carried against Ministers by a majority of eight. 'The Bishops waver, and the Thanes fly from us, and in my opinion the Bill will not pass,' writes Colonel Fitzpatrick to his brother the same day.[1]

Still far greater was the effect of the Royal message upon the 17th of December, on the motion 'that the Bill be committed.' Then after a long and keen debate the motion was negatived and the Bill thrown out by, including proxies, 95 votes against 76. On this occasion all or nearly all the 'King's friends' either took part against the Bill or stayed away. The Prince of Wales had voted with his friends in office in the division of the 15th, but during the interval the King's aversion to the Bill was so clearly conveyed to him that he could no longer affect to doubt it, and on the 17th he was absent from the House. Strange to say, one of the Cabinet Ministers, Lord Stormont, President of the Council, formed part of the final majority against the Bill. Stranger still, it would seem that his colleagues, considering his personal adherence to the King, bore him no ill will on that account. Lord Holland in his notes writes of it as follows: 'It is just to remark that Lord Stormont, a stiff, formal man, of high Tory principles, always during his political connection with Mr. Fox conducted himself with great honour and fairness, and Mr. Fox has frequently told me that he behaved well.'

In the midst of this crisis the Commons had adjourned for two days, in consequence of a death in the Speaker's family. But they met again upon the 17th. Then, and while the debate upon the India Bill in the other House was still depending, Mr. Baker, of Hertford, a personal friend of Burke, rose in his place and adverted in strong terms to the rumours of the conference between Lord Temple and the King, and he concluded by proposing a Resolution in the following terms: 'That it is now necessary to declare that to report any opinion or pretended opinion of His Majesty upon any Bill or other proceeding depending in either House of Parliament, with a view to influence the votes of the Members, is a high crime and misdemeanor, derogatory to the honour of the Crown, a breach of the fundamental privileges of Parliament, and subversive of the Constitution of this country.'

No sooner was the motion moved and seconded than Pitt rose. He denounced the Resolution as 'one of the most unnecessary, the most frivolous and ill-timed that ever insulted the attention of the national Senate,' since it neither contained any specific charge, nor yet was directed to any decisive issue. As against it he moved the Order of the Day, and he was seconded by Lord Mahon. But Lord North, speaking with especial weight as the King's Minister for so many years, warmly urged the propriety and necessity of the Resolution before the House; and it was further supported by Fox in one of the most able and most animated of his many great speeches at this time. 'The question is not,' he said, 'whether His Majesty shall avail himself of such advice as no one readily avows, but who is answerable for such advice. . . . . How, Sir, are Ministers situated on this ground? Do they not come into power with a halter about their necks, by which the most contemptible wretch in the kingdom may despatch them at pleasure? Yes: they hold their several offices, not at the option of the Sovereign, but of the very reptiles who burrow under the Throne: they act the part of puppets, and are answerable for all the folly and the ignorance, and the temerity or timidity, of some unknown juggler behind the screen!' And not content with such general terms of condemnation, Fox proceeded in no covert terms to point his invective against Pitt. 'Boys without judgment, without experience of the sentiments suggested by the knowledge of the world, or the amiable decencies of a sound mind, may follow the headlong course of ambition thus precipitately, and vault into the seat while the reins of government are placed in other hands. But the Minister who can bear to act such a dishonourable part, and the country that suffers it, will be mutual plagues and curses to each other.'

The masterly speech of Fox was followed by an overwhelming majority in favour of the motion—153 voting for it, and no more than 80 against it. Erskine—unabashed at his recent failure, and, rather than be silent, ready to encounter many other failures in Parliament—then rose to move a second Resolution. This, which was carried by like numbers, declared that the House would pursue the redress of the abuses which had prevailed in the government of India, and would regard as a public enemy any person who should advise His Majesty to interrupt the discharge of this important duty.

Thus on the morning of Thursday, the 18th of December, the two Houses stood directly and keenly arrayed against each other. The Commons had pledged themselves to the principles of their India Bill, and denounced, in violent terms, the means employed against it, while the Peers, on their part, had flung out the Bill itself.

Supported by their vast majority in the Commons, Fox and his colleagues determined to stand their ground. They deemed it wisest to cast upon the King the entire responsibility of a change of Government. During the whole of the 18th, from hour to hour, the King was in expectation of receiving the resignation of his Ministers. Finding that none came, he took a step that could no longer be deferred. Very late that evening—it was indeed near midnight—Mr. Fox and Lord North, as Secretaries of State, received the King's orders, that they should deliver up their Seals of office, and send them by their Under Secretaries, since a personal interview on the occasion would be disagreeable to His Majesty. The Seals thus sent were given by the King next morning to Lord Temple, who immediately took the oaths as Secretary of State, and as such wrote letters of dismissal to the other Ministers.

That the course of the King in these transactions was an extreme stretch of his prerogative is indisputable. That it was, as Mr. Fox's friends have all along contended, a manifest infringement of his Constitutional duty is not to be so readily admitted. Perhaps we may think that, when closely viewed, the Constitutional relation of the Sovereign to his responsible advisers is by no means so clear and well-defined as it might at first sight appear. Perhaps we may come to the conclusion that it must depend in many cases rather on good feeling and principle upon both sides than on any fixed and undeviating rule. Let us for this inquiry assume the case of the India Bill to be exactly such as its adversaries made it. Here then was a Bill containing an insidious and disguised attack on the Royal Prerogative. On general principles we can scarcely blame a King for being careful of his Prerogative, so long as we continue to applaud each House of Parliament for being jealous of its privileges. Now, in the particular case which we suppose before us, the Bill containing this attack had been by the Minister so artfully and ably prepared, that in the first instance neither the King nor yet the public at large discerned the danger. But when the discussions in Parliament arose, that danger was made manifest, and painted in the strongest light by the Opposition speakers. With so much force of argument did they denounce the Bill, that they brought a great portion of the public round to their opinion. What then? Is the King to be the only person in the kingdom forbidden to derive new lights from the debates in Parliament? Is he to be absolutely and in all cases bound to the assent which the first draft of a measure, as glossed over by his Ministers, may have received from him? Then if not, what course should he take? Is he bound to dismiss his Ministers at the very moment that these new lights have flashed upon his mind? Is he bound in that dismissal entirely to disregard the consideration whether that precise period may not be of all others the most inopportune for defeating their designs? Then if delay be allowed him, are his lips meanwhile to be altogether sealed? Is he bound to hide even from members of his family, from old servants or from trusted friends, the feelings or the wishes that are swelling in his breast? It will be owned, I think, by any candid inquirer that some of these questions might be found in practice most perplexing to decide. Without denying then that the course pursued in this emergency by George the Third was most unusual and most extreme, and one most undesirable to establish as a precedent, I greatly doubt whether it would be practicable to lay down with perfect clearness and precision the Constitutional rule which he is supposed to have infringed.

But whatever bolts of party indignation have been, or may be, hurled against the King or against Lord Temple, they at all events fall short of Pitt. He had taken no part in these transactions. So far as we can trace, he had not even been apprised of them beforehand. It was only after the final issue that the King, turning for aid to the only adequate antagonist of Fox, asked him to undertake his responsible support as his new Prime Minister. Nor did Pitt prove unequal to the crisis. Without one moment's faltering, he responded to the call. Thus when on the afternoon of the same day, the 19th of December, the House of Commons met—thronged with an expectant and buzzing crowd, and Fox and North taking their seats on the front Opposition benches,—there was seen to walk in a young Member, Mr. Richard Pepper Arden, holding an open paper in his hand; and soon afterwards rising in his place he moved a new Writ for the borough of Appleby, 'in the room of the Right Honourable William Pitt, who, since his election, has accepted the office of First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer.' So hazardous seemed the venture that, as we are assured, this motion was received with loud and general laughter on the Opposition side. The friends of Fox and North were not in the least depressed. They looked forward, and not unreasonably, to an early and triumphant resumption of their offices. They were even taunted by Lord Mulgrave, in the debate which ensued, as looking much too merry.

A discussion at once arose. Dundas, as representing the new Prime Minister, moved that the House should sit on the next day, a Saturday, to expedite the passing of the Land Tax Bill. But he did not venture to divide the House against Fox, who proposed the usual adjournment to Monday, his object being, as the event showed, rather to make manifest his power than to obstruct the progress of what he owned to be a necessary measure. In his speech Fox referred to the event of a Dissolution as certain and near impending. 'No one,' he cried,

'would say that such a prerogative ought to be exercised merely to suit the convenience of an ambitious young man. And I here, in the face of the House, declare that if a Dissolution shall take place, and if very solid and substantial reasons are not assigned for it, I shall, if I have the honour of a seat in the next Parliament, move a very serious inquiry into the business, and bring the advisers of it to account.'

To the same effect spoke also Lord North : 'Though a new writ has been moved for Appleby, I am not to be deceived by such a device. I believe that there is not a man in the House who is not sure that a Dissolution is at hand.'

So exasperated, indeed, were the Opposition chiefs —so large the majority to back them in the House of Commons—and so doubtful as yet the prospects of a general election—that Pitt found the greatest difficulty in forming his new Government. Many men who expressed to him their approval and good wishes had, or alleged they had, some special reason to hang back.

On the other hand, Pitt had one piece of good fortune which he had not expected. Earl Gower enjoyed at this time a large measure of public esteem. In the autumn of 1779 he had seceded from Lord North's Cabinet rather than continue the American war. In the spring of 1783 he had been solicited by the King to form an administration of his own. He was not on any terms of political connection or intercourse with Pitt. Yet at this juncture he sent through a friend a message to the new Premier. He stated that, desirous as he was of retirement for the remainder of his life, he could not be deemed a candidate for office, but that in the present distressed state of his King and country he was willing to serve in any place where he could be useful. The offer was eagerly accepted, and on that same day, the 20th of December, Earl Gower was declared Lord President of the Council.

One disappointment to Pitt was, however, wholly unforeseen. He had reckoned upon his kinsman Lord Temple to fill the office of Secretary of State, and to lead the House of Lords; but Temple, who, on the morning of Friday the 19th, had accepted the Seals, suddenly, on the evening of Sunday the 21st, determined to resign them. Under all the circumstances this was a 'heavy blow and great discouragement' to the not yet formed administration.

We obtain at this place, from Bishop Tomline, one of those personal recollections which are so seldom to be found in his pages. Adverting to the sudden resignation, he adds—

'This was the only event of a public nature which I ever knew disturb Mr. Pitt's rest while he continued in good health. Lord Temple's resignation was determined upon at a late hour in the evening of the 21st, and when I went into Mr. Pitt's bedroom the next morning he told me that he had not had a moment's sleep. He expressed great uneasiness at the state of public affairs, at the same time declaring his fixed resolution not to abandon the situation he had undertaken, but to make the best stand in his power, though very doubtful of the result. Some of his confidential friends coming to him soon after he was dressed, he entered, with his usual composure and energy, into the discussion of points which required immediate decision—all feeling the present moment to be one of peculiar anxiety and difficulty.' [1]

The resignation of Lord Temple was stated in the House of Commons that same day, the 22nd. His brother William, who announced the fact, attempted also to explain it. Having in the first place adverted to the Resolution which the House had passed on Mr. Baker's motion, Mr. Grenville added, 'I am authorised by my Noble Relative to say that he is ready to meet any charge that shall be brought against him; and that he may not be supposed to make his situation as Minister stand in the way of, or serve as a protection or shelter from inquiry and from justice, he had that day resigned into His Majesty's hands the Seals of office with which his Majesty had so lately been pleased to honour him; so that my Noble Relative is now in his private capacity, unprotected by the influence of office, to answer for his conduct whenever he shall hear the charge that may be brought against it.'

Fox rose next. He said, with something of disdain in his tone, that Lord Temple was no doubt the best judge of his own situation. He knew why he had accepted, he knew why he retired from office; but certainly no one had said that any resolution would be levelled against the noble lord, and he (Mr. Fox) hoped that the members of the House would not be turned aside by that incident from the consideration of the important business which was that very evening to come before them.

The important business to which Fox referred was a motion by Erskine, which was made immediately afterwards in a Committee of the whole House, upon the state of the nation. It was an Address to the Crown against either a Prorogation or a Dissolution of Parliament. Mr. Bankes, as a personal friend of Pitt, rose and said that he had authority to declare that the new Prime Minister had no intention whatever to advise a Dissolution. Nevertheless, Mr. Erskine, by the advice of his friends, persisted in his Address, which, after long debate but no division, was carried.

Later that same night, in a letter which Fox addressed to his confidential friend Lord Northington, we find him, notwithstanding his disclaimer in the House, refer to the secession of Lord Temple as to a great party advantage:—'I now think it necessary to despatch a servant to you to let you know that Lord Temple has this day resigned. What will follow is not yet known, but I think there can be very little doubt but our administration will again be established. The confusion of the enemy is beyond description, and the triumph of our friends proportionable.'[1]

It is natural to inquire what was really the reason of this strange step on the part of Lord Temple. That reason, though often discussed, has never been clearly explained. I may therefore be forgiven if I enter at some length into this still controverted point.

In the first place, it is to be observed that Lord Temple, on his resignation, at once retired to Stowe, and that for several years to come he took no farther part in politics; nor did he ever again fill any office in England. Secondly, it seems to be admitted on all sides that the explanation given by William Grenville in the House of Commons by no means suffices. The resolution of Mr. Baker had passed the night before Lord Temple took office. If, then, that resolution, or the personal attacks that might be expected to ensue from it, were to weigh with Lord Temple at all, they would have prevented his acceptance, and not produced his resignation, of the Seals.

Lord Macaulay, in his excellent sketch of Mr. Pitt, has made the following statement:—

'The general opinion (in December, 1783) was that there would be an immediate Dissolution; but Pitt wisely determined to give the public feeling time to gather strength. On this point he differed from his kinsman Temple. The consequence was that Temple, who had been appointed one of the Secretaries of State, resigned his office forty-eight hours after he had accepted it.'

Presuming on the cordial friendship which, to my good fortune, existed between Lord Macaulay and myself, I wrote to him upon this subject. While sending for his perusal an unpublished manuscript of Burke from another period, I expressed my doubts whether he had any good authority for the statement which I have here transcribed. With perfect frankness, Lord Macaulay replied as follows:—

Holly Lodge: Dec. 2, 1858.

My dear Stanhope,—I return Burke's paper. It is interesting, and very characteristic.

I am afraid that I can find no better authority for the account which I have given of Temple's resignation than that of Wraxall, who tells the story very confidently and circumstantially, but whose unsupported testimony is of little value, even when he relates what he himself saw and heard, and of no value when he relates what passed in the secrecy of the Cabinet. After looking at Tomline's narrative and at the 'Buckingham Papers,' I am satisfied that I was wrong. Whenever Black reprints the article separately, as he proposes to do, the error shall be corrected.

Ever yours truly, MACAULAY.

Several weeks later Lord Macaulay pointed out to me that the publication of the 'Cornwallis Papers,' which had since occurred, might tend in some degree to corroborate the statement of Wraxall. He referred to a letter dated March 3, 1784, in which Lord Cornwallis says, 'I do not believe Lord Temple and Mr. Pitt ever had any quarrel, and think that the former resigned because they would not dissolve the Parliament. I may, however, be mistaken in this.'

It seems to me clear, from the concluding words, that Lord Cornwallis spoke only from common report; and when, in the first part, he assumes that there had been no resentment on Lord Temple's part, he was, as will presently be shown, quite mistaken.

There is no doubt, from what Wraxall and Lord Cornwallis write, that there was a prevalent rumour in 1784 of the resignation of Lord Temple having been caused by his fixed desire for an immediate Dissolution; but the question remains how far that rumour was truly founded.

One document, hitherto unpublished, seems to me on this point decisive. There is a letter from the King to

Mr. Pitt, dated April 12, 1789, and referring to Lord Temple, then Marquis of Buckingham and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. In that letter the King speaks of 'his base conduct in 1784.' I know not to what these words can possibly refer, unless it be to the resignation just before the new year. Now at that very period, as we learn from other private letters of the King, His Majesty was warmly pressing a Dissolution on his Ministers, and he could not be angry with Lord Temple for holding the same opinion as himself.

Another document which bears upon this question was preserved among the Buckingham papers, and was published in 1853.[1] It is a letter of Lord Temple to Mr. Pitt only a few days after his resignation, and dated Stowe, December 29, 1783. This letter will be found to breathe ire and resentment in every line. In it Lord Temple most bitterly complains that there has not been any mark of the King's approbation to him on account of his Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland. It appears that 'various marks of favour' had been suggested by his brother William, and that Pitt had actually offered a peerage for his second son, which, however, Lord Temple thought insufficient, and declined.

This letter is further to be compared with several more written by Lord Temple in 1789, in reference to his second Lord Lieutenancy. Here again we find him pressing most warmly for some special mark of the King's favour, and having in view a Dukedom. For this object he engaged the aid not only of his brother William, but of Mr. Pitt. The King, however, had determined many years before to grant no more Dukedoms except to Princes of the Blood.

On the whole then it seems to me the most probable conclusion that in December, 1783, Lord Temple had asked for a Dukedom, or some other personal object of ambition. Finding that the King refused him, and that Mr. Pitt was not willing to make that personal object a sine quâ non condition in so anxious a state of public affairs, he flung down the Seals in anger and set off to Stowe.

Undismayed by the adverse vote of the House of Commons on Monday the 22nd, we find Pitt apply himself with energy all through the 23rd to complete his appointments. Here is his note to his friend the Duke of Rutland:—

Berkeley Square, Tuesday, eleven o'clock, Dec. 23, 1783.

My dear Duke,—In this decisive moment, for my own sake and that of the country, I trust I may have recourse to your zeal and friendship. My hands are so full that I cannot be sure of calling on you. Will you, if possible, come here at twelve? I am to see the King at one.

Ever most truly yours, W. PITT.

The journal of Wilberforce that same day, the 23rd, has the following entry:—'Morning, Pitt's. Pitt nobly firm. Cabinet formed.'

In forming his Cabinet Pitt experienced several disappointments. Already some days back his father's most intimate friend, Lord Camden, had declined to take part in the hazardous venture, and refused the Presidency of the Council. In like manner the Duke of Grafton, whom Pitt had summoned from Suffolk, refused the Privy Seal. From men also of less note and beyond the Cabinet pale there were answers in the negative. Thus for example Lord Mahon declined office, not apparently from any disinclination at that time to Mr. Pitt, but as I conjecture from his superior attachment to the pursuits of science.

Mr. Pitt proceeded to fill up the several offices—as Bishop Tomline tells us—in the best manner he could, though not exactly as he wished. Earl Gower was President of the Council. The Duke of Rutland took the Privy Seal. The Seals of Secretary of State were entrusted to two other Peers, Lord Sydney and the Marquis of Carmarthen, eldest son of the Duke of Leeds, who had been in his father's lifetime called up to the House of Lords. Lord Thurlow, almost as of course, resumed the Great Seal. Lord Howe was First Lord of the Admiralty. These with the Premier formed the new Cabinet, which was therefore of only seven persons, and of these seven one only, Pitt himself, was a member of the House of Commons.

The Duke of Richmond went back to his former office of Master-General of the Ordnance, but declined a seat in the Cabinet. But only a few weeks afterwards, as the fight grew hotter, he felt an ambition to serve in the front ranks, and he asked for and obtained the responsible post which he had at first refused.

In like manner Dundas, on whom Pitt relied as his principal assistant in debate, resumed the post which he had held in Lord Shelburne's administration as Treasurer of the Navy. Lloyd Kenyon became Attorney, and Pepper Arden Solicitor General. Of his other young friends, Pitt placed Eliot in the Board of Treasury, and Jefferies Pratt in the Board of Admiralty. William Grenville and Lord Mulgrave were (after some delay) joint-Paymasters of the Forces; George Rose and Thomas Steele joint-Secretaries of the Treasury.

In the evening of the same day, the 23rd, Pitt convened a meeting of his principal adherents in the House of Commons. Wilberforce, in his 'Recollections,' gives of it a lively account:—'We had a great meeting that night of all Pitt's friends in Downing Street. As Pratt, Tom Steele, and I were going up to it in a hackney-coach from the House of Commons, 'Pitt must take care,' I said, 'whom he makes Secretary of the Treasury; it is rather a rogueish office.' 'Mind what you say,' answered Steele, 'for I am Secretary of the Treasury!' At Pitt's we had a long discussion, and I remember well the great penetration shown by Lord Mahon. 'What am I to do,' said Pitt, 'if they stop the Supplies?' 'They will not stop them,' said Mahon;

'it is the very thing which they will not venture to do.'

Next day, the 24th, the King upon his Throne received the members of the House of Commons, who, with Fox at their head, brought up their Address of the 22nd. In his answer, as prepared by Pitt, the King assured them that, 'after such an adjournment as the present circumstances might seem to require,' he should not interrupt their meeting by any exercise of his prerogative, either of Prorogation or Dissolution. On this assurance Fox agreed that the House of Commons, after meeting again on the 26th for the issue of Writs, should adjourn for some Christmas holidays. But he insisted upon it that the adjournment should be only for the shortest period—not to extend beyond the 12th of January, and the House then to go again into Committee on the state of the nation. It was useless to divide the House against a chief who commanded a sure majority.

Fox and his friends continued sanguine of the issue. Thus he wrote to Lord Northington at Dublin:—'I neither quit your house nor dismiss one servant till I see the event of the 12th.' And in the same strain spoke his friend Mrs. Crewe. 'Well,' she said to Wilberforce, 'Mr. Pitt may do what he likes during the holidays; but depend upon it, it will be only a mince-pie administration.'

So overwhelmed with business was Pitt at this period, that among Lady Chatham's papers I find only one letter from him between the 11th of November and the 16th of March. Here is what that letter says of politics:—

Berkeley Square, Dec. 30, 1783.

You will easily believe it is not from inclination I have been silent so long. Things are in general more promising than they have been, but in the uncertainty of effect the persuasion of not being wrong is, as you say, the best circumstance and enough; though there is satisfaction in the hopes at least of something more.

CHAPTER V.

Difficulties of Pitt's position—His India Bill—His public spirit—Fox's popularity declines—Proceedings of the 'Independents'—Party conflicts in the Commons—Address to the King—Pitt attacked in his coach—Revulsion of national feeling—Schemes of Fox—The Great Seal stolen—Dissolution of Parliament.

When, at the age of twenty-four, Mr. Pitt was called upon to fill the highest place in the councils of his Sovereign, he found himself surrounded by most formidable difficulties—the greatest perhaps that any Prime Minister of England ever had to grapple with. Arrayed against him was a compact majority of the House of Commons, led on by chiefs of consummate oratorical ability—by Burke and Sheridan, by Fox and Lord North. The finances, at the close of an unprosperous war, were in the utmost disorder. The commercial system with the now independent colonies was as yet undetermined, and required prompt and final regulation. Our foreign relations, which at last had left us almost without a single ally, called for vigilant foresight and conciliatory care. But as claiming precedence above all others was the East India question. It was necessary for the new Cabinet, without the loss of a single hour, to frame a new measure in place of that which the House of Lords had rejected. It was necessary also that the measure should be submitted both to the Court of Directors and the Court of Proprietors, and their approval, if possible, obtained before that of the House of Commons was asked.

By incessant labour Mr. Pitt and his colleagues attained this object. Their Draft Bill was not only prepared, but was approved by both sections of the East India body, previous to the meeting of the House of Commons on January the 12th.

The expected day came at last. Fox rose at the unusual hour of half-past two, and moved the order of the day. He was soon interrupted by the newly-elected members, Pitt among them, who came up to the table to take the oaths. When that ceremony had concluded, Pitt and Fox rose together—the Minister holding in his hand, as he stated, a Message from the King which he desired to deliver; but the Opposition chief insisted on his own previous right to speak, and the Speaker, being appealed to, decided that Mr. Fox was in possession of the House.

A debate of many hours ensued. Mr. Fox, in his principal speech, took up very dangerous ground. His great object seemed to be to secure himself against a Dissolution. With this view he ventured to assert that the Crown did not possess the right, as Burke afterwards termed it, of a 'penal Dissolution'—the privilege, namely, of dissolving Parliament in the midst of a Session, and in consequence of the votes it had given. There had been no instance of the kind since the Revolution; and there was a pamphlet by Lord Somers, in which it might be thought, from some doubtful expressions, that the right was controverted. 'But we are told,' continued Fox, 'that nothing has yet happened to make the Dissolution of the Parliament necessary. No! What does that signify? Let us go into the Committee, and make it impossible!'

Mr. Pitt, on his part, strongly pressed that the Members should not pledge themselves by any vote against him until they had an opportunity of seeing the new Bill for the government of India, which he had prepared and was ready to bring in. Being, in the course of the debate, repeatedly attacked on the point of secret influence, he was permitted to speak a second time. This he did in a tone of lofty denial and disdain. 'I came up no back stairs,' he said. 'When I was sent for by my Sovereign to know whether I would accept of office, I necessarily went to the Royal Closet. I know of no secret influence, and I hope that my own integrity would be my guardian against that danger. This is the only answer I shall ever deign to make to such a charge; but of one thing the House may rest assured that I will never have the meanness to act under the concealed influence of others, nor the hypocrisy to pretend, when the measures of my administration are blamed, that they were measures not of my advising. If any former Ministers' (and here he looked at Lord North) 'take these charges to themselves, to them be the sting.'

At half-past two in the morning the House divided on the question of going into Committee, which was carried by a majority of 39. In Committee Fox proceeded to move three Resolutions:—First, that any person issuing money for the public service, without the sanction of an Appropriation Act, would be guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor; secondly, that an account should be rendered of all sums of money issued since the 19th of December for services voted, but not yet appropriated by Act of Parliament; and thirdly, to postpone the second reading of the Mutiny Bill to the 23rd of February.

These three Resolutions being carried without dividing the Committee, two more were moved by Lord Surrey, and gave rise to another violent debate:—First, as to the necessity of an administration which should have the confidence of that House and of the public; and, secondly, to state that the late changes in His Majesty's Councils were preceded by universal reports of an unconstitutional abuse of His Majesty's sacred name.

As the readiest means to get rid of these Resolutions, Dundas moved that the Chairman should leave the Chair; but he was defeated by the increased majority of 54, and the two further Resolutions were adopted.

It was not till the close of these stormy proceedings that Pitt was allowed to deliver the Message from the King. This was merely to announce, in the usual form, that on account of the river Weser being frozen up, it had been found necessary to disembark in England two divisions of Hessian troops on their return from the American contest; but that His Majesty had given directions that as soon as the Weser should be open they should be sent to Germany. An Address of thanks to the King for his gracious communication was agreed to, and at half-past seven in the morning the House adjourned.

The result was certainly, to all appearance, most inauspicious to the Government. On the very first day when Pitt appeared in the House of Commons as Prime Minister, five hostile motions were carried against him; and he was left in two minorities, the one of 39 and the other of 54. Mr. Pitt, however, was not dispirited. He gave notice, before the members separated, that he should next day move for leave to bring in his India Bill; and the King, on learning the event of the first divisions, came up from Windsor, and in an audience that same evening assured the Minister of a firmness not inferior to his own.

Next day, the 14th, according to his notice, Pitt proceeded to lay his India Bill before the House of Commons. So far, he said, from violating chartered rights, he had sought to frame his measure in amicable concert with the Company, while at the same time he trusted that it would be most effectual for the reformation of abuses. He proposed to establish a new department of State, without, however, any new salaries—a 'Board of Control' which should divide with the Directors the entire administration of India, but leave the patronage untouched. 'It is my idea,' said Pitt, 'that this should be a Board of political control, and not, as the former was, a Board of political influence.' All the details of this plan were unfolded by Pitt at great length in a speech of consummate ability; but no sooner had he sat down than Fox, without allowing a moment of further consideration to his rival's scheme, started up, and, with equal ability, denounced every part of it, although on that occasion he did not divide the House.

The attacks upon the Goverment were now in various forms, but with incessant activity, renewed. Again and again was Pitt put on his defence. Finding that he did not resign in consequence of the proceedings on the 12th, Fox, so early as the 16th, insisted that the House should go again into Committee. There Lord Charles Spencer moved a Resolution that the continuance of the Ministers in office was contrary to Constitutional principles. After a sharp debate, the Resolution was affirmed by the diminished majority of 21.

This diminished majority may in great part be ascribed to the conciliatory temper which at this time began to appear among the independent members. In the debate upon Lord Charles's motion, there were, for the first time, public expressions of the wish that Pitt and Fox might be induced to act together as colleagues in the same Cabinet. Such a junction seemed to the more tranquil spirits to afford the only hope of safety, or at least of quiet. Foremost among those who called for it were Thomas Grosvenor, Member for Chester, and Charles Marsham, Member for Kent, both well known and esteemed. But the ablest of this respectable little band, and more especially its spokesman, was Thomas Powys, Member for Northamptonshire, an upright and active country gentleman, and not undistinguished in debate.

Mr. Powys might, with the more propriety, attempt in his speeches at least the character of mediator, since he did not at this time belong in fact to either party. He had been a follower of Fox, but had loudly condemned his coalition with Lord North. He did not like, he said, the ground on which the new Ministers came into office, but was much impressed with the tokens that he saw of the ability and public spirit of Pitt.

The next great trial of parties was on the 23rd, when Pitt's East India Bill stood for its second reading. Then Fox exerted all his influence, and on the motion for commitment the Bill was thrown out, but by a majority of no more than eight.

It will be seen from the very small majority that the House of Commons came to this last vote with some reluctance. It was felt as bringing matters to a crisis with the Ministry; it was felt to render probable an immediate Dissolution. No sooner then was the India Bill rejected, than the Chiefs of the Opposition, one after another, rose, and vehemently questioned Pitt as to his intentions. The fiercest threats and the bitterest invectives were freely used. To these questions so intemperately urged the Minister gave no reply. There were loud cries from the Opposition benches for Mr. Pitt to rise, but Mr. Pitt sat still.

At length, in the midst of the tumult, started up General Conway, the former colleague of Pitt in the Shelburne administration. He was a man who in the course of a long public life had shown little vigour or decision, but who was much respected for his honourable character and his moderate counsels. Now, as often happens to weak men, he had caught the contagion of the violence around him. He inveighed in furious terms against what he called 'the sulky silence' of the Minister. 'The Right Hon. gentleman,' he said, 'is bound to explain for the sake of his own honour; but all the conduct of these Ministers,' he added, 'is dark and intricate. They exist only by corruption, and they are now about to dissolve Parliament after sending their agents round the country to bribe men.'

But here Pitt, though with lofty calmness, interrupted Conway. He rose, he said, to order. He had a right to call upon the Right Hon. General to specify the instances where the agents of Ministers had gone about the country practising bribery. It was a statement which he believed the Right Hon. General could not bring to proof, and which, as he could not prove, he ought not to assert. For his own honour, he claimed to be the sole and sufficient judge of it; and he concluded by a most felicitous quotation (which in reply to such an onset could have been in no degree premeditated) of some words in which Scipio as a young man rebukes the veteran Fabius for his intemperate invectives: 'Si nullâ aliâ re modestiâ certe et temperando linguæ adolescens senem vicero.'[1]

Finding that no answer could be wrung from the Minister on the point of the expected Dissolution, Fox insisted, although the hour was two in the morning and the day was Saturday, that the House should adjourn only till twelve o'clock, at which time he hoped members would attend to vindicate the honour and assert the privileges of the Commons.

At the appointed hour, the House having met in large numbers, Mr. Powys rose. His emotion was such that he shed tears while he was speaking. He declared that the scene of confusion which he beheld last night had so haunted his mind that he had never since been able to divert his thoughts one moment from it. He entreated the Minister to reply, at least thus far, whether on Monday next the House might expect to meet again to proceed to business. Mr. Pitt remained silent, but Mr. Powys with the greatest earnestness renewed his question. Then at last Pitt rose. 'I have laid down to myself,' he said, 'a rule from which I do not think I ought in duty to depart. I decline to pledge myself to the House that in any possible situation of affairs I would not advise His Majesty to dissolve Parliament. However, as the Hon. gentleman has brought the matter to a very small point, I will so far gratify him as to answer that I have no intention to prevent the meeting of the House on Monday next.' Fox said nothing, and the House immediately adjourned.

[1] (Liv. lib. xxviii. c. 44.) The Parliamentary History at this place mentions only 'a classical text,' but the precise reference has been happily preserved by Bishop Tomline (Life of Pitt, vol. i. p. 299).

While these things were passing in Parliament, Pitt had an opportunity to give a most signal proof of his public spirit in office. To this instance Mr. Powys had referred, with expressions of the highest praise, in his speech on Lord Charles's motion. It so chanced that on the 11th of January, the very day before Parliament met, Sir Edward Walpole, a younger son of the great Sir Robert, had died. By his death there fell in the Clerkship of the Pells, a sinecure place for life, worth 3,000*l.* a-year. It was in the gift of the Prime Minister, and tenable with a seat in the House of Commons. Every one expected that Pitt would take the office for himself. Such a course would have been in complete conformity with the feelings and the practice of his age. Such a course was strongly advised by his private friends. Such a course was commended to him by a stronger temptation than any of his predecessors in the premiership, his father alone excepted, can have felt. Unlike the rest, he had a most slender patrimony. If he failed in his struggle with the Opposition, he could only return to his practice at the Bar, and that he would so fail was the common belief. It is plain from the private letters of the time, that many even of those who wished him victory, by no means expected it; at the very best it was a perilous and doubtful issue. But by taking for himself the brilliant prize which was already in his hands, he might make himself independent, so far as fortune went, of all party vicissitudes. He might, with 3,000*l.* a-year secured to him, apply himself wholly to the aims of public life.

But as Wilberforce had lately said, Pitt was 'nobly firm.' Instead of taking the office for himself, he determined to save its income to the public. He undertook to efface a scandalous job which Lord Rockingham had perpetrated. That well-meaning, but most feeble nobleman, during his last administration, had sanctioned as a Government measure the Bill for Economical Reform drawn up by Burke. According to that Bill the Crown was precluded from granting a pension to any higher amount than 300*l.* a-year. But while that Bill was still before Parliament, and while therefore its clauses were only morally binding on its authors, Lord Rockingham had granted a pension more than tenfold beyond the limits which he was seeking to enact—a pension, namely, of 3,200*l.* a-year to Colonel Barré. By this grant he was certainly not seeking profits or emoluments for himself. He was not even seeking them for any of his personal friends. His object was to gratify and conciliate the section of Lord Shelburne, with which he was at that time bound up in administration. He had no ill design, but it is lamentable that he failed to see the glaring contrast between the legislation which he proposed, and the course which he pursued.

To obliterate the pension which had been—to say the least—so improvidently granted, Pitt made arrangements that Barré should now resign it, receiving in return the Clerkship of the Pells for life. This appointment made at once a strong impression on the country. It fixed as on a rock for the whole of his life the character of Pitt for personal disinterestedness. 'It is a great thing,' says Lord Macaulay, 'for a man who has only three hundred a-year to be able to show that he considers three thousand a-year as mere dirt beneath his feet when compared with the public interest and the public esteem.'

Two or three weeks after the event we find Lord Thurlow, in a debate of the House of Lords, refer to this patriotic act in terms of manly frankness:—'I must acknowledge,' he said, 'that I was shabby enough to advise Mr. Pitt to take this office, as it had so fairly fallen into his hands; and I believe I should have been shabby enough to have done so myself, since other great and exalted characters had so recently set me the example.' Bishop Tomline states that he saw Colonel Barré soon after this offer was made him, and that nothing could exceed the warm terms in which he spoke of it in a public view :—'Sir,' said Barré, 'it is the act of a man who feels that he stands upon a high eminence in the eyes of that country which he is destined to govern.'

There were other favourable indications in the country. Fox in his ardour had certainly overshot his mark. He had made it with his Sovereign a struggle as of life and death. He had made it, as Dr. Johnson afterwards said, a contest whether the nation should be ruled by the sceptre of George the Third, or by the tongue of Fox.[1] On the 16th of December he had joined in a Resolution against the King's conduct, when not yet dismissed from the King's service. On the 12th of January he had seemed to question two of the most important and most undoubted of the King's prerogatives—the right to appoint the Ministers, and the right to dissolve the Parliament. He would not grant the ordinary courtesy to postpone his attacks in the House of Commons until after the re-election and re-appearance of the new Minister. He refused the least respite, the smallest interval for consideration of the measures which that Minister might desire to bring forward. So much violence of conduct, so much acrimony of invective, are not easily to be defended. At the present day a writer of high authority, who loves the memory of Fox, but who has still higher regard for the cause of truth and law, gives it as his opinion that 'the conduct of Mr. Fox and the majority of the House of Commons was wanting in dignity and in adherence to the spirit of the Constitution.'[2]

Such also grew to be in great measure the public opinion at the time. The violent conduct of Fox served as a counterpoise to the violent conduct of the King. Men began to forget the Royal interference with the votes of the House of Lords, as they beheld night after night the most unbridled faction triumphant in the House of Commons.

Pitt, with great sagacity, discerned those signs of the times. He saw that the popularity of Fox had waned, but not departed. He saw that the public opinion was changing, but not yet changed. He saw that although an immediate Dissolution might gain him some votes, a deferred Dissolution might gain him many more. Therefore, when on the rejection of his India Bill upon the 23rd of January, he was pressed by several friends to appeal at once to the people, and pressed by no one more warmly than by the King, Pitt did not yield to the Royal solicitations any more than to the Parliamentary attacks; and he practised that hardest of all lessons to an eager mind in a hard-run contest—to wait.

The battle in the House of Commons therefore recommenced. In debates, which often extended beyond the morning dawn, Pitt was again assailed by the utmost force of eloquence, and the utmost acrimony of invective. The public beheld with astonishment the young man of twenty-four—the boy, as his adversaries love to call him—wage this unequal conflict almost single-handed. The common idea seems to have been that the more numerous and experienced party of the late Administration must ere long prevail. As Gibbon once exclaimed in a most picturesque phrase,—'Depend upon it Billy's painted galley must soon sink under Charles's black collier.'[1]

Up to this time the Lords had remained spectators of the contest. But an opportunity now arose for them to strike a blow. On the 4th of February the Earl of Effingham brought forward a motion—grounded on some late Resolutions—which charged the House of Commons with attempting of their own authority to suspend the execution of the law. The motion was affirmed by 100 votes against 53, and an Address to the King being framed from it, and presented, received from His Majesty a most gracious reply.

The King's prerogative was also brought into action. His Majesty had refused to create any Peers at the request of the Duke of Portland, but was most willing to do so at the request of Mr. Pitt. So early as the 30th of December Thomas Pitt had been raised to the Upper House as Lord Camelford; and before the close of January there was a batch of three. Mr. Eliot, one of the Members for Cornwall, and the father of Pitt's friend, became Lord Eliot. An English Barony was granted to Mr. Henry Thynne as Lord Carteret, and another to the Duke of Northumberland, to descend to his second son. These creations were in a most unusual manner bitterly inveighed against by Mr. Fox in the House of Commons. Indeed it might be difficult to say which branch of the Royal Prerogatives Mr. Fox at that period would have been content to spare.

At this period also Pitt found an opportunity, most welcome to his feelings, to provide for both the tutors of his youth. Mr. Wilson became a Canon of Windsor, and Mr. Pretyman a Canon of Westminster. The last appointment had the further advantage, as it was considered, that it did not call Mr. Pretyman from town. He remained in Downing Street with the Prime Minister, and filled for some time longer the place of his private secretary. Mr. Pretyman, in the same year that he received this preferment, married Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Maltby, Esq. She became ere long an intimate friend of Lady Harriot Pitt.

Pitt found also that he could no longer defer his arrangements with respect to Ireland. He induced his friend the Duke of Rutland to undertake the office of Lord Lieutenant, and adjoined to him an excellent man of business, Mr. Thomas Orde. The Duke set out for his mission in the middle of February, and immediately afterwards we find Pitt write to him as follows:—

Berkeley Square, Feb. 17, 1784.

My dear Duke,—Nothing passed of material consequence yesterday. The House came to Resolutions relative to the proceedings of the Lords which will not have much effect one way or other. The House, however, sat so late that we adjourned till to-morrow. We shall then probably come to the question of postponing the supplies, though I think the enemy rather flinches. What the consequence will be is as doubtful as when you left us. At all events, I trust nothing can arise to 'nterrupt your progress; for come what may, your taking possession is, I think, of the utmost consequence. I hope to be able to send you further accounts before you reach Holyhead. My brother has given me the memorandums you left, which must be managed as well as they can. The independents are still indefatigable for Coalition, but as ineffectual as ever.

Believe me always, my dear Duke, &c., W. Pitt.

The proceedings of these independents will now require some detail. So early as the 26th of January they had held a meeting at the St. Alban's Tavern. They had met to the number of fifty-three, and placed in the chair Mr. Thomas Grosvenor. They had felt that the two great rival champions, flushed with their nightly conflicts in the House of Commons, could scarcely be expected to confer in the day time, and to negotiate a treaty of peace with any prospect of success. Under such circumstances it seemed to them that the Duke of Portland, so lately the First Lord of the Treasury, would be the most proper representative of Fox's side. An Address was agreed to and subscribed by all the Members present, entreating the Duke and Mr. Pitt to communicate with each other, and endeavour to remove every impediment to a cordial concert of measures. A Special Committee also was appointed to present the Address and to assist in the negotiation.

To this overture Pitt responded with the utmost frankness. He declared that whatever might be the difficulties in the way of the union itself, there was no difficulty on his part in the way of an immediate intercourse with the Duke of Portland on the matter that had been suggested to them. But the Duke having consulted Fox, said that he must decline even to meet the Prime Minister, until he had first, in compliance with the vote of the House of Commons, resigned his office. To this preliminary condition Pitt, as was natural, demurred. Thus the gentlemen of the St. Alban's had the mortification to find that, so far from effecting a junction, they could not even effect an interview.

By no means yet discouraged, these gentlemen induced Mr. Grosvenor, as their Chairman, to move a Resolution in the House of Commons, on the 2nd of February, declaring that the state of the country called for an extended and united Ministry. Both Pitt and Fox held nearly the same language on this subject. Both declared that they felt no personal objections, but would not consent to combine except on public principles. On this general ground the motion of Mr. Grosvenor passed without a single negative.

But no sooner was this motion disposed of than Mr. Coke of Norfolk, acting in concert with Fox, rose to move another Resolution—that the contiuuance of the present Ministers in office was an obstacle in the way of forming another Administration, which should have the confidence of the House of Commons.

It was still insisted by Fox and Portland—for the dignity, as they said, of the House of Commons—that Pitt should absolutely resign his office before they would hold a single conference with him respecting the new arrangements. 'With what regard to personal honour or public principle can this be expected?' cried Pitt, with lofty indignation, in the course of this debate. 'What, Sir, that I, defending—as I believe myself to do—the fortress of the Constitution, and that fortress alone, should consent to march out of it with a halter about my neck, change my armour, and meanly beg to be re-admitted as a volunteer in the army of the enemy! . . . . The sacrifice of the sentiments of men of honour is no light matter; and when it is considered how much was to be given up to open a negotiation —what insulting attacks had been made, and what clamours had been excited—I think that some regard ought to be paid to my being willing to meet the wishes of these respectable gentlemen, who call for an union of parties.' But notwithstanding this earnest appeal, the motion of Mr. Coke was carried in a full House by a majority of 19.

The truth is, that except the gentlemen at the St. Alban's Tavern, none of the parties to this negotiation had much wish for its success. The King had given his consent to it with great reluctance. Pitt was determined to bate nothing of his honour. Fox was sanguine of being borne back to office on the shoulders of the House of Commons. At his instigation the Duke of Portland made every possible difficulty. First he must see the King's writing; next he must see the King himself. The former point was conceded, and the second all but promised. Then the Duke began to cavil at Pitt's phrase of a junction 'on fair and equal terms.' Instead of the word 'equal' His Grace desired to use the word 'equitable,' the object being manifestly that Fox might obtain a large preponderance, and leave only a few crumbs of office to Pitt's friends. On this subject Pitt finally wrote as follows to Mr. Powys:—

Feb. 29, 1784.

Mr. Pitt has all along felt that explanation on all the particulars, both of measures and arangements, with a view to the formation of a new administration, would be best obtained by personal and confidential intercourse. On this idea Mr. Pitt has not attempted to define in what manner the principle of equality should be applied to all the particulars of arrangements, nor discuss by what precise mode it may be best carried into effect; but he is so convinced that it is impossible to form any union except on that principle, that it would be in vain to proceed, if there is any objection to its being stated in the outset that the object for which His Majesty calls on the Duke of Portland and Mr. Pitt to confer is the formation of a new administration on a wide basis, and on a fair and equal footing.

But the Duke of Portland would not give way; and at this point, to the great concern of the St. Alban's gentlemen, the whole negotiation ended.

On a review of all these semi-diplomatic proceedings, it might at first sight be supposed that the main obstacle to them turned on two points: first, the position of Lord North; and secondly, the plan of Fox for the government of India; but with neither was this the case. It is no more than justice to the Minister of the American war if I point out how frank, how fair, how thoroughly in the spirit of a gentleman was his conduct at this crisis. Pitt had openly declared that he never would consent to act with Lord North as a colleague. This declaration, though made entirely on public grounds, might well justify some strong resentment on the other side; but, far from this, Lord North was eager to see Fox and Pitt united. 'And God forbid,' he said in Parliament, 'that I should be the person to stand in the way of so great and necessary a measure.' He plainly intimated that in such a case he should, with the greatest readiness, relinquish all pretensions of his own.

With respect to the East India Bill, Fox, seeing the unpopularity of his former measure, had been forward and eager to declare in Parliament that he was willing to give up some of its chief provisions. In private he was still more explicit. He told Mr. Marsham, on the part of the St. Alban's gentlemen—and Marsham afterwards repeated it in the House of Commons—that 'provided Mr. Pitt would agree that the government of India should be in this country, and should be permanent at least for a certain number of years, he would leave it to that Right Honourable gentleman to settle the point of patronage as he pleased. With this information' (thus continued Marsham) 'I waited on the Minister, who told me that the point of patronage being thus given up, an opening was so far made to a negotiation.'[1]

It is not to be imagined that this negotiation, while it still went on, had suspended the party conflicts in the House of Commons. There, on the contrary, the battle continued; and it was, indeed, as it has been called, 'a battle of giants.' Scarce any debate which did not elicit a most masterly speech of Fox, and another not less able of Pitt upon the other side—each enforcing the same topics with an ever fresh variety of illustration and of language. Thus how happily, on one occasion, does Fox advert to a celebrated passage from Lord Chatham in defence of his own coalition with Lord North!—'I recollect,' he said, 'to have seen a beautiful speech of a near relation of the Right Honourable gentleman over against me, in which, to discredit a coalition formerly made between the Duke of Newcastle and my father, it was compared to the junction of the Rhone and the Saone. Whatever the effect and truth and dread of that comparison might have been at that time and upon that occasion, I am not at all afraid of it now. I would not have admitted that great and illustrious person, were he now living, to have compared the late Coalition to the Rhone and the Saone as they join at Lyons, where the one may be said to be too calm and tranquil and gentle, the other to have too much violence and rapidity; but I would have advised him to take a view of those rivers a hundred miles lower down, where, having mingled and united their waters, instead of the contrast they exhibited at their junction, they had become a broad, great, and most powerful stream, flowing with the useful velocity that does not injure, but adorns and benefits the country through which it passes. This is a just type of the late Coalition; and I will venture to assert, after mature experience, that whatever the enemies of it may have hoped, it is as impossible now to disunite or separate its parts as it would be to separate the waters of those united streams.'

On the other hand, with how much admirable force and spirit did Pitt vindicate his own position and the King's!—'Where' (with these words did he close one of his most celebrated speeches), 'where is now the boasted equipoise of the British Constitution? Where is now that balance among the three branches of the Legislature which our ancestors have meted out to each with so much care? Where is the independence—nay, where is even the safety of any one prerogative of the Crown, or even of the Crown itself, if its prerogative of naming Ministers is to be usurped by this House, or if—which is precisely the same thing—its nomination of them is to be negatived by us without stating any one ground of distrust in the men, and without suffering ourselves to have any experience of their measures? Dreadful, therefore, as the conflict is, my conscience, my duty, my fixed regard for the Constitution of our ancestors, maintain me still in this arduous post. It is not any proud contempt or defiance of the Constitutional Resolutions of this House—it is no personal point of honour, much less is it any lust of power—that makes me still cling to office. The situation of the times requires of me, and, I will add, the country calls aloud to me, that I should defend this castle, and I am determined therefore that I will defend it!'

On the 18th of February Fox ventured an experiment upon the feelings of the House. He proposed that the Report of the Committee of Supply, which stood for that evening, should be postponed for only three days. He disclaimed all intention of obstructing the public business, and pleaded only for a short delay, that the House might have leisure to consider the anomalous position of the Government. Pitt treated the motion as a direct refusal of supply, and on a division it was carried by a majority of only 9.

On the 20th Mr. Powys moved and resolved that the House relied on the King's readiness to form an united and efficient Administration. But several more of the independent members appear on this occasion to have rallied round Mr. Powys. His Resolution was carried by a majority of 20, and an Address to the King, which Fox immediately founded upon it, by 21. To give the more solemnity to this Address, it was ordered to be presented by the whole House. Then, after a most stormy sitting, and at past five in the morning, the House adjourned.

On the 25th, accordingly, the Speaker, attended by a numerous train of members, was summoned to the Royal presence, and heard the King deliver the reply which his Minister had carefully prepared. The tone was frank and explicit, and at the same time conciliatory. His Majesty stated the very recent endeavours which he had made to effect an union of parties on a fair and equal footing, and lamented that these endeavours should have failed. He declared himself unable to perceive how such an object could in any degree be advanced by the dismissal of those at present in his service, more especially as no specific charge was urged against them. 'And under these circumstances,' said the King in conclusion, 'I trust my faithful Commons will not wish that the essential offices of Executive Government should be vacated until I see a prospect that such a plan of union as I have called for, and they have pointed out, may be carried into effect.'

Much chafed at this new rebuff, Fox determined that on the 1st of March he would himself move another Address of the same tenor, but in stronger terms.

During this interval, however, Pitt was exposed to an onset of a different nature. Earlier in the month the Corporation of London had passed a vote of thanks to him for his public conduct, as also the freedom of the City to be presented in a gold box of the value of one hundred guineas. A Committee appointed to carry these Resolutions into effect went on Saturday, the 28th, in procession—preceded by the City Marshal, and accompanied by the Sheriffs and Town Clerk—to the house in Berkeley Square, where Pitt then resided with his brother, Lord Chatham. After the presentation of the Vote of Thanks and gold box the whole party went on together to the hall of the Grocers' Company in the Poultry, where the Prime Minister was engaged to dine. Great crowds had been assembled in Berkeley Square from an early hour in the morning, and an immense concourse of people joined the procession after it left Lord Chatham's house, marching through the City amidst the loudest acclamations and shouts of welcome. At Grocers' Hall Pitt was also loudly cheered as he took the usual oath administered to freemen, and was addressed in a speech of most laudatory purport by the Chamberlain—no other than John Wilkes. In returning at night there was the same throng, there were the same acclamations. Such tokens of the rising popular favour to Pitt must have been of course gall and wormwood to those who desired to be called exclusively the 'Friends of the People.' Thus, at night, when the crowd of artisans was dragging up St. James's Street the coach in which sat Pitt himself, Lord Chatham, and Lord Mahon, and when they had come opposite Brooks's Club, at that period the stronghold of his political opponents, the coach was suddenly attacked by men armed with bludgeons and broken chair-poles, among whom—so at least it was at the time asserted and believed—were seen several members of the Club. Some of the rioters made their way to the carriage, forced open the door, and aimed blows at the Prime Minister, which were, with some difficulty, warded off by his brother's arm. At length Mr. Pitt and his companions, after a severe struggle, made their way into White's Club. Hearing of this attack, 'I called there,' writes Wilberforce, 'and to bed about three.' The servants were much bruised, and the carriage was nearly demolished.

At a later period we find the authors of the 'Political Eclogues' refer to this transaction, which, for their own credit, surely they had better have avoided. But being ashamed to name Mr. Pitt in connexion with it, they transfer their raillery to Lord Mahon:—

> Ah! why Mahon's disastrous fate record?
> Alas, how fear can change the fiercest Lord!
> See the sad sequel of the Grocers' treat;
> Behold him dashing up St. James's Street,
> Pelted and scared by Brooks's hellish sprites,
> And vainly fluttering round the door of White's.

On the day but one ensuing, the 1st of March, Fox fulfilled his intention of moving a new Address to the Crown for the dismissal of Ministers. He was supported by Lord Surrey and General Conway; opposed by Pitt, Wilberforce, and Sir William Dolben. In the division which ensued the Address was carried by a majority of 12. But the only result from it was an answer from the King on the 4th, declining compliance on the grounds which he had already stated. What more was now the Opposition to do?

Fox during the greater part of February appears to have thought the game in his own hands. The time had passed when Pitt could dissolve the Parliament, and convene another previous to the 25th of March, on which day the Mutiny Act would expire. And by his command of the majority within the House, Fox expected that he could at any time deal as he pleased, either with the new Mutiny Bill or the Supplies, and thus force his rival to an unconditional surrender. But in this view he had not reckoned on the revulsion of national feeling.

Within a month from the re-assembling of the House symptoms of this change appeared. The Corporation, and also the merchants and traders of London, took the lead; they presented Addresses to the King, in which they expressed their approval of the conduct of the House of Lords in rejecting Mr. Fox's India Bill, and thanked His Majesty for dismissing his late Ministers. Several other towns and districts immediately bestirred themselves to follow this example, and sent in Address upon Address of the same kind. The earliest of these were scoffed at and derided by Fox as mere make-believes:—'To such shifts and impositions,' he cried, 'are the Ministers and those who support them driven to prop up their tottering fabric!' But, although Fox might thus delude himself as to the first few of the Addresses, the time came when he could no longer close his eyes to their growing number.

The effect on others was at all events clear. Several watchers of the times in the House of Commons, who had hitherto been most staunch in Opposition, began to waver and hang back. Already, after the vote which they had given with Fox, postponing the Supplies for only two months, several Members—no doubt pressed by their constituents still more than by their consciences—had risen in their place to protest most earnestly—one Member even as he said upon his honour—that they had never meant, never wished, never dreamt to refuse their Sovereign a Supply. And Fox saw with bitter mortification that he could no longer propose any vote of the same kind with the smallest prospect of success.

Still, however, one resource remained. Fox hoped that, though he could not stop the Supplies, he might shorten the Mutiny Bill. On two occasions in debate he sounded the House as to the propriety of passing a Mutiny Bill for only a month or six weeks, so that their privileges might not be curtailed, nor their period of Session broken through. In this suggestion he was zealously supported by the ancient champion of prerogative, Lord North. But here again the force of public feeling told against him. The members for cities and counties could scarcely venture to give such votes in the teeth of the loyal Addresses that were daily pouring in. Under such circumstances the idea of a short Mutiny Bill was so coldly received that it could not be pressed.

Fox had no alternative but to relinquish the present struggle, and lie in wait for any future slips of his opponent. And thus the contests between these mighty statesmen were in truth decided by the voice of the nation, even before it was appealed to in due form by a Dissolution.

But before Fox threw down his arms he determined to aim another blow. It was his object both to put on record the maxims which he had recently maintained, and to try the numbers that might still adhere to him. He gave notice that on the 8th he would move for the adoption of the House a long state-paper. This he called a Representation to the King, though in fact it was rather intended as a manifesto to the people. It had been drawn up by Burke with great care and skill.

The rumour ran already that this was to be the last great movement on Fox's side. By eleven o'clock in the morning the gallery for strangers was thronged. The gentlemen who could obtain admittance sat with the utmost patience from that hour till the meeting of the House at four. Then a severe disappointment was in store for them. Then Sir James Lowther by a freak of capricious displeasure insisted on the unwise privilege which is still allowed even to any single member, and ordered the gallery to be cleared. The loss has extended even to future times, since it has deprived them of all except the most summary reports of this memorable and crowning debate. At length at midnight, and in breathless suspense, the House divided. The motion was found to be carried, but by a majority of only one, the numbers being 190 and 191. Such a result was felt to be at once decisive. We may picture to ourselves the blank looks of the Opposition, and the rising cheers of the Ministerial ranks.

Next day, the 9th of March, came on the long-expected Committee on the Mutiny Bill. When the Secretary at War moved in the customary form that the blank as to the time should be filled up for the usual period of one year, it was found that in spite of all the previous threats no opposition was attempted. Only two independent Members, Sir Matthew White Ridley and Mr. Powys, rose to lament what they termed the degradation of the House. 'Not a century ago,' cried Mr. Powys, 'a vote of the Commons could bestow a Crown; now it cannot even procure the dismissal of a Minister!' Sir Matthew White Ridley on his part declared—no doubt as a remedy to the evils complained of—that he had resolved to cease his own attendance in a House which had been sacrificed by its constituents.

On the same day we find Pitt write as follows to the Duke of Rutland:—

Berkeley Square, Tuesday night,
March 10, 1784.

My dear Duke,—I am happy more than I can tell you in all the good accounts you have sent us from Ireland. I ought long before this to have made you some return, but I could never have done it so well as this evening. We yesterday were beat only by one, on the concluding measure of Opposition, a long representation to the King, intended as a manifesto to the public, where its effect is not much to be dreaded. To-day the Mutiny Bill has gone through the Committee without any opposition (after all the threats) to the duration for a twelvemonth. The enemy seem indeed to be on their backs, though certainly the game left in our hands is still difficult enough. They give out that they do not mean to oppose supplies, or give any interruption to business; but their object is certainly to lie in wait, or at least catch us in some scrape, that they may make our ground worse with the public before any appeal is made there. The sooner that can be done I think the better, and I hope the difficulties in the way are vanishing.

You see I am so full of English politics that I hardly say a word on Irish, though I am sure you have a right to expect a considerable mixture of them. Another messenger will follow this in a day or two, and I will then acquit my promise of sending the paper Orde left with me, with the necessary remarks. . . . I write now in great haste, and tired to death, even with victory, for I think our present state is entitled to that name. Adieu, my dear Duke.

Believe me ever yours, W. PITT.

Thus had Pitt remained the conqueror in the hard fight which he had fought with such unflinching courage and such consummate skill — worn out indeed as he describes himself, and as it were sinking to the ground with the labours of the conflict, but grasping firmly the palms of triumph in his hand.

A few days later he wrote to Lady Chatham also :

Downing Street, Tuesday night,
March 16 (1784).

My dear Mother,—Though it is in literal truth but a single moment I have, I cannot help employing it to thank you a thousand and a thousand times for the pleasure of your letter. I certainly feel our present situation a triumph, at least compared with what it was. The joy of it is indeed doubled by the reflection of its extending and contributing to your satisfaction. Among other benefits I begin to expect every day a little more leisure, and to have some time for reading and writing pleasanter papers than those of business.

Ever, my dear Mother, &c., W. PITT.

Obviously in this state of public feeling it had become the game of Fox to offer no obstruction to public measures, and afford no plea for the Dissolution of Parliament. Thus Pitt was enabled to carry without hindrance the necessary votes of Supply, but did not propose an Appropriation Bill, on which his enemy might have made a stand with some advantage. During this time he was constantly plied with questions and invectives as to the expected Dissolution. But he remained steadily silent. At length, on the 23rd, all the necessary preparations were completed, and we find Pitt announce the fact as follows to the Duke of Rutland :—

Downing Street, Tuesday night,
March 23, 1784.

My dear Duke,—The interesting circumstances of the present moment, though they are a double reason for my writing to you, hardly leave me the time to do it. Per tot discrimina rerum, we are at length arrived within sight of a Dissolution. The Bill to continue the powers of regulating the intercourse with America to the 20th of June will pass the House of Lords to-day. That and the Mutiny Bill will receive the Royal Assent to-morrow, and the King will then make a short speech and dissolve the Parliament. Our calculations for the new elections are very favourable, and the spirit of the people seems still progressive in our favour. The new Parliament may meet about the 15th or 16th of May, and I hope we may so employ the interval as to have all the necessary business rapidly brought on, and make the Session a short one. . . .

We shall now soon have a little more leisure, and be better able to attend to real business in a regular way, instead of the occurrences of the day.

Believe me, &c., W. PITT.

Everything therefore was brought in readiness for the Dissolution of Parliament. But at this very juncture there occurred a most strange event. Early in the morning of the 24th some thieves broke into the back part of the house of the Lord Chancellor, in Great Ormond Street, which at that time bordered on the open fields. They went up stairs into the room adjoining the study, where they found the Great Seal of England, with a small sum of money and two silver-hilted swords. All these they carried off without alarming any of the servants, and though a reward was afterwards offered for their discovery, they were never traced.

When the Chancellor rose and was apprised of this singular robbery, he hastened to the house of Mr. Pitt, and both Ministers without delay waited upon the King. The Great Seal being essential for a Dissolution, its disappearance at the very time when it was most needed might well cause great suspicion, as well as some perplexity. But Pitt took the promptest measures; he summoned a council to meet at St. James's Palace the same morning, and there an order was issued that a new Great Seal, with the date of 1784, should be prepared with the least possible delay. It was promised that, by employing able workmen all through the night, this necessary work should be completed by noon the next day.

That same morning Pitt found time for a letter to his friend in Yorkshire.

Dear Wilberforce,—Parliament will be prorogued to-day and dissolved to-morrow. The latter operation has been in some danger of delay by a curious manœuvre, that of stealing the Great Seal last night from the Chancellor's, but we shall have a new one ready in time.

I send you a copy of the Speech which will be made in two hours from the Throne. You may speak of it in the past tense, instead of the future.

A letter accompanies this from Lord Mahon to Wyvill, which you will be so good as to give him. I am told Sir Robert Hildyard is the right candidate for the county. You must take care to keep all our friends together, and to tear the enemy to pieces.

I set out this evening for Cambridge, where I expect, notwithstanding your boding, to find everything favourable. I am sure, however, to find a retreat at Bath.

Ever faithfully yours, W. Pitt.

The requisite measures having thus been taken, the King, according to his original intention, went down to the House of Lords the same afternoon, and in a short speech closed this eventful scene. 'On a full consideration,' thus began His Majesty, 'of the present situation of affairs, and of the extraordinary circumstances which have produced it, I am induced to put an end to this Session of Parliament. I feel it a duty which I owe to the Constitution and to the country in such a situation, to recur as speedily as possible to the sense of my people by calling a new Parliament. . . .

And I trust that the various important objects which will require consideration may be afterwards proceeded upon with less interruption and with happier effect.' Next day, the new Great Seal being ready according to promise, the Parliament was dissolved by Royal Proclamation.

This disappearance of the Great Seal has ever since remained a mystery. It may be observed that in his letter to Wilberforce Pitt speaks of it as 'a curious manœuvre.' Certainly it seems difficult to suppose that a theft so critically timed was altogether unconnected with political design. On the other hand, no man of common candour will entertain the least suspicion that Fox or North, or any one of the Whig chiefs, was in any measure cognisant of this mean and criminal device. Such a slander against them would only recoil on the man who made it. But their party, like every other in England, both before and since, had no doubt within, or rather behind its ranks, some low runners ready to perform, without the knowledge of their leaders, any dirty trick which they might think of service, and the dirtier the better to their taste. Such runners would have been constantly hearing that a Dissolution at that juncture might be the ruin of their party views; that even a few days' delay might be of service, as giving the people time to cool. Can it be deemed incredible that under such circumstances even common thieves and burglars should be taken into pay by men in real fact perhaps baser than thieves and burglars are? It may be objected that on this supposition a greatly overstrained importance was attached to the possession of the Great Seal. But we may well imagine that an humble and heated partisan should be under the same delusion as was, in 1688, the King of England himself, when, hoping to embarrass his successor, he dropped his Great Seal into the Thames.

CHAPTER VI.

Pitt elected for the University of Cambridge, and Wilberforce for the County of York—Fox's Westminster Contest—Numerous defeats of Fox's friends—New Peerages—Meeting of Parliament—Predominance of Pitt—Disorder of the Finances—Frauds on the Revenue—Pitt's Budget—His India Bill—Westminster Scrutiny—Restoration of Forfeited Estates in Scotland—Letters to Lady Chatham—Promotions in the Peerage—Lord Camden President of the Council.

Now rose the war-cry of the hustings throughout England. Almost everywhere Fox's banner was unfurled, and almost everywhere struck down. The first election in point of time was as usual for the City. There Pitt was put in nomination without his knowledge or consent, and the show of hands was declared to be in his favour, but when apprised of the fact he declined the poll. He was pressed to stand for several other cities and towns, more especially for the city of Bath, which his father had represented, and the King was vexed at his refusal of this offer. But the choice of Pitt was already made. He had determined, as we have seen, to offer himself again for the University of Cambridge.

As another candidate on the same side, Pitt was aided by the eldest son of the Duke of Grafton, his father's friend. They were opposed by the two late Members, Mr. John Townshend and Mr. Mansfield, both of whom had held office in the Coalition Ministry. After a keen contest Mr. Pitt and Lord Euston were returned—Pitt at the head of the poll. It was a great triumph, and no merely fleeting one, for Pitt continued to represent the University during the remainder of his life.

It has been said that Paley, who was then at Cambridge, suggested one evening as a fitting text for an University sermon: 'There is a lad here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes; but what are they among so many?' But the author, whoever he was, of this pleasantry, altogether mistook the public temper of the time. In most cases the electors voted without views of personal interest; in some cases they voted even against views of personal interest.

Such was the fact, for example, in the strongholds of the Whig estates. Thus in Norfolk the late Member had been Mr. Coke, lord of the vast domains of Holkham—a gentleman who, according to his own opinion, as stated in his Address to the county, had played 'a distinguished part' in opposing the American War. But notwithstanding his alleged claims of distinction, and his much more certain claims of property, Mr. Coke found it necessary to decline the contest.

But of all the contests of this period the most important in that point of view was for the county of York. That great county, not yet at election times severed into Ridings, had been under the sway of the Whig Houses. Bolton Abbey, Castle Howard, and Wentworth Park had claimed the right to dictate at the hustings. It was not till 1780 that the spirit of the county rose. 'Hitherto'—so in that year spoke Sir George Savile—'I have been elected in Lord Rockingham's dining-room. Now I am returned by my constituents.' And in 1784 the spirit of the county rose higher still. In 1784 the independent freeholders of Yorkshire boldly confronted the great Houses, and insisted on returning, in conjunction with the heir of Duncombe Park, a banker's son, of few years and of scarcely tried abilities, though destined to a high place in his country's annals—Mr. Wilberforce. With the help of the country-gentlemen they raised the vast sum of 18,662*l.* for the expense of the election; and so great was their show of numbers and of resolution, that the candidates upon the other side did not venture to stand a contest. Wilberforce was also returned at the head of the poll by his former constituents at Hull. 'I can never congratulate you enough on such glorious success,' wrote the Prime Minister to his young friend.

In this manner throughout England the Opposition party was scattered far and wide. To use a gambling metaphor, which Fox would not have disdained, many threw down their cards. Many others played, but lost the rubber. A witty nickname was commonly applied to them. In allusion to the History, written by John Fox, of the sufferers under the Romish persecution, they were called 'Fox's Martyrs.' And of such martyrs there proved to be no less than one hundred and sixty.

Nor were these losses to the Coalition party confined to the rank and file. Several of their spokesmen or their leaders also fell. At Hertford, Mr. Baker succumbed to Baron Dimsdale; at Portsmouth, Mr. Erskine to a brother of Lord Cornwallis; at Bury, General Conway to a son of the Duke of Grafton. Lord Galway, an Irish peer of no great pretensions, prevailed in the city of York over Fox's most trusted friend and colleague Lord John Cavendish. Some escapes there were of course, though for the most part narrow ones. In Bedfordshire, Mr. St. John carried his election by a single vote; at Norwich, Mr. Windham had on his side nearly thirteen hundred voters, but a majority of only fifty-four. Burke was safe at Malton, Sheridan was safe at Stafford, and Lord North was safe at Banbury.

Amidst all these reverses, however, Fox's high courage never quailed. On the 3rd of April we find him write as follows to a friend: 'Plenty of bad news from all quarters, but I think I feel that misfortunes when they come thick have the effect rather of rousing my spirits than sinking them.'[1]

The case of Fox himself in these elections should be the last recorded, since it extended very far beyond the date of the rest. He had appealed again to his old constituents at Westminster. So had also his late colleague, Sir Cecil Wray. That gentleman had been formerly not only his colleague, but his follower; but had become estranged from him by his ill-starred Coalition, and was now inclined to support the Government of Pitt.

As their principal candidate at Westminster the Government set up a Peer of Ireland, and naval chief of high repute, Lord Hood. It soon appeared that Lord Hood would be at the head of the poll, and that the real contest would be between Fox and Wray. The voters came forward slowly, and the poll continued open from day to day, and from week to week—that is from the 1st of April to the 17th of May. During this time every nerve was strained on either side. Several ladies of rank and fashion stood forth as Fox's friends—at their head, Georgiana, the eldest daughter of Earl Spencer, and the wife, since 1774, of the fifth Duke of Devonshire. Of great beauty and unconquerable spirit, she tried all her powers of persuasion on the shopkeepers of Westminster. Other ladies who could not rival her beauty might at least follow her example. Scarce a street or alley which they did not canvass in behalf of him whom they persisted in calling 'the Man of the People,' at the very moment when the popular voice was everywhere declaring against him.

Fox had one supporter of even higher rank and importance. The Prince of Wales, after attending the King at a review, rode through the streets of Westminster wearing Fox's colours, and partook of a banquet which was given to his friend at Devonshire House. Henceforth, as of course, the influence of Carlton House was set up against the influence of St. James's. It came to be not only Fox against Pitt, but Prince against King.

At the hustings in Covent Garden, hour after hour, the orators strove to out-argue and the mobs to outbawl each other. All day long the open space in front resounded with alternate clamours, while the walls were white with placards, and the newspapers teeming with lampoons. Taverns and public-houses were thrown open at vast expense. Troops of infuriated partisans, decked with party ribbons and flushed with gin and wine, were wont to have fierce conflicts in the streets, often with severe injuries inflicted, and in one instance even with loss of life.

Up to the twenty-third day of the polling Fox was in a minority, notwithstanding the immense exertions that had been made in his behalf. The Ministerial party were sanguine in the hope of wresting from him the greatest and most enlightened, as it was then considered, of all the represented boroughs of England.

'Westminster goes on well in spite of the Duchess of Devonshire and the other Women of the People; but when the poll will close is uncertain,' so writes Pitt to Wilberforce on the 8th of April. Here is another letter which he wrote a few days afterwards to his cousin James Grenville, the same who, in 1797, became Lord Glastonbury.

Downing Street, Friday,
April 23, 1784.

My dear Sir,—Admiral Hood tells me he left Lord Nugent at Bath, disposed to come to town if a vote at Westminster should be material. I think from the state of the poll it may be very much so. The numbers on the close today are—

H. 6326. Wr. 5699. F. 5615.

And Sir Cecil has gained four on Fox to-day. There is no doubt, I believe, of final success on a scrutiny, if we are driven to it; but it is a great object to us to carry the return for both in the first instance, and on every account as great an object to Fox to prevent it. It is uncertain how long the poll will continue, but pretty clear it cannot be over till after Monday. If you will have the goodness to state these circumstances to Lord Nugent, and encourage his good designs, we shall be very much obliged to you; and still more, should neither health nor particular engagements detain you, if besides prevailing upon him you could give your own personal assistance. At all events I hope you will forgive my troubling you, and allow for the importunity of a hardened electioneerer.

We have had accounts from Bath which alarm us for Mr. H. Grenville, but I hope you will have found him mended. I have not yet heard the event of Bucks, but William was sure, and by the first day's poll Aubrey's prospect seems very good. Mainwaring and Wilkes are considerably a-head in Middlesex, and Lord Grimston has come in, instead of Halsey, for Herts.

Adieu, my dear Sir, and believe me ever faithfully and affectionately yours, W. PITT.

The early minority of Fox was, however, at last retrieved. On the twenty-third day of the polling he passed Sir Cecil, and he continued to maintain his advantage till the fortieth, when by law the contest closed. Then on the 17th of May the numbers stood: for Lord Hood, 6,694; for Mr. Fox, 6,233; and for Sir Cecil Wray, 5,598. There was strong reason, however, to suspect many fraudulent practices in the previous days, since it seemed clear that the total number of votes recorded was considerably beyond the number of persons entitled to the franchise. For this reason Sir Cecil Wray at once demanded a scrutiny, and the High Bailiff—illegally, as Fox contended—granted the request. But further still, the High Bailiff, Mr. Corbett, who was no friend to Fox, refused to make any legal return until this scrutiny should be decided. Thus Westminster was left for the present destitute of Representatives, and Fox would have been without a seat in the new Parliament but for the friendship of Sir Thomas Dundas, through which he had been already returned the member for the close boroughs of Kirkwall.

In considering the causes which, taken together, produced this almost unparalleled accession to the Ministerial ranks, we must allow something to the disgust of the Coalition, and something to the alarm of the India Bill. We must allow something both for the reverent remembrance of Chatham, and for the rising fame of Pitt. But above all, we must bear in mind that, owing to these motives, Pitt won a combined aid from quarters hitherto in public life most wide asunder. He had with him many Dissenters, and many Churchmen; many friends of the King's prerogative, and many assertors of the people's rights. He had from the one side such men as Jenkinson and Thurlow; from the other such men as Sawbridge and John Wilkes. For the Coalition, as Lord Macaulay well observes, had at once alienated the most zealous Tories from North, and the most zealous Whigs from Fox.

Looking back to these eventful four months—from December 1783, to April 1784—it will be found perhaps that by far the nearest parallel to them which our history affords is the first administration of Sir Robert Peel—that other period of four months from December 1834, to April 1835. Some points of essential difference between them have indeed been pointed out by Sir Robert Peel himself.[1] But on the other hand there are many points of similitude which he did not and he could not state. In both there was the same oratorical pre-eminence—in both the same absence of colleagues efficient for debate—in both, therefore, the same glory to have fought such a battle single-handed. Of both Pitt and Peel it may be said with truth, as I conceive, that besides the ability which their enemies have never denied, courage, temper, and discretion were evinced by them in the highest degree amidst all the circumstances that could most severely task and try these eminent qualities. Not one hasty or inconsiderate expression, not a single false step, can perhaps within these periods be charged upon either. Both were opposed by eloquent and powerful antagonists exasperated by recent dismissal from office, through the unjust exercise, as they deemed it, of the Royal prerogative. In both cases the violence of the press exceeded all customary bounds. In both there was the same appeal by a Dissolution to the judgment of the people, though in the one case the appeal preceded and in the other followed the conflict in the House of Commons. Yet how opposite the result, since—though without at all implying on that account any inferiority of genius in the latter statesman—Pitt succeeded and Peel was overthrown.

At the close of the Elections the King showed his entire approval of his Minister by the grant—perhaps a little lavish—of seven new peerages. The others were to Baronies; but one, Sir James Lowther, whose influence at Appleby had not been forgotten, was raised at once to higher rank as Earl of Lonsdale. Three other Earldoms were now conferred, and three more in the ensuing summer, on Peers who were Barons already.

The King also consented, at the request of Pitt, that in place of Sir Lloyd Kenyon, who became Master of the Rolls, Mr. Archibald Macdonald should be made Solicitor General. But it is remarkable that his Majesty, even at that early period, expressed his own preference for Mr. Scott.

On the 18th of May the new Parliament met, and on the 19th was opened by the King in person. After several days consumed in swearing in Members, the debates began upon the 24th. The proceedings in the House of Commons are related as follows by Mr. Pitt himself in a letter the same night to the Duke of Rutland:—

Downing Street, May 24, 1784.

My dear Duke,—I cannot let the messenger go without congratulating you on the prospect confirmed to us by the opening of the Session. Our first battle was previous to the Address on the subject of the return for Westminster. The enemy chose to put themselves on bad ground by moving that two Members ought to have been returned without first hearing the High Bailiff to explain the reasons of his conduct. We beat them on this by 283 to 136. The High Bailiff is to attend to-day, and it will depend upon the circumstances stated whether he will be ordered to proceed in the scrutiny, or immediately to make a double return, which will bring the question before a Committee. In either case I have no doubt of Fox being thrown out, though in either there may be great delay, inconvenience, and expense, and the choice of the alternative is delicate. We afterwards proceeded to the Address, in which nothing was objected to but the thanking the King expressly for the Dissolution. Opposition argued everything weakly, and had the appearance of a vanquished party, which appeared still more in the division, when the numbers were 282 to 114. We can have little doubt that the progress of the Session will furnish throughout a happy contrast to the last. We have indeed nothing to contend against but the heat of the weather, and the delicacy of some of the subjects which must be brought forward. Adieu. Ever affectionately yours, W. PITT.

The predominance of Mr. Pitt, as shown in these first divisions, was maintained, it may be said, not only through this Session, but through this Parliament and through the next. Henceforth an historical writer may glide far more rapidly over the debates than when the fate of a Government or of a party hung suspended and trembling in the balance.

There were two subjects which at this time demanded immediate attention from the Legislature: first, the public finances; and secondly, the affairs of the East India Company.

As to the first, they were in deplorable disorder. Lord North by no means wanted knowledge or skill in his department, but he was wholly deficient in resolution to look his difficulties fairly in the face. His administration of the finances was merely a series of makeshifts and expedients. As the readiest means of meeting any sudden call, he had allowed the unfunded debt to grow to an enormous magnitude, so that the outstanding bills issued during the war were at a discount of fifteen or twenty per cent. Consols themselves were at 56 or 57, scarcely higher than during the most adverse periods of the recent contest. So vast was the prevalence of smuggling—so numerous were the frauds on the revenue —that the income of the country during the last year had fallen far below even its reduced expenditure, and it was foreseen as almost inevitable (and yet how severe a trial to the popularity of any Minister!) that the return of peace must be celebrated by the imposition of new taxes.

Of these many and gigantic evils, the frauds on the revenue might be deemed to call the loudest for a remedy. Tea was then the staple of smuggling. All other branches of illicit traffic seemed slight and insignificant by the side of this. According to Pitt's calculation, about thirteen millions pounds weight of tea were consumed every year in England, while only five millions and a half were sold by the East India Company, so that the illicit trade in this article was more than double the legal trade. It had been reduced to a regular system. Forty thousand persons by sea and by land were said to be engaged in it; and the large capital requisite for their operations came, as was believed, from gentlemen of rank and character in London. Ships—some of 300 tons burden—lay out at sea and dealt out their cargoes of tea to small colliers and barges, by which they were landed at different places along the coast, where bands of armed men were stationed to receive and protect them. 'Not merely the revenue'—this is the statement of Captain Macbride—'is affected by smuggling, though that would be mischief enough, but the agriculture and manufactures of the island are in danger of being ruined. The farmers near the coast have already changed their occupation, and instead of employing their horses to till the soil, they use them for the more advantageous purpose of carrying smuggled goods to a distance from the shore. The manufacturers will catch the contagion, and the loom and the anvil will be deserted. In former wars the smugglers had not conducted themselves as enemies to their country, but in the late war they enticed away sailors from the King's ships, concealed such as deserted, gave intelligence to the enemy, and did everything in their power hostile to the interest of Great Britain.'[1]

Such was the spirit that had grown up under Lord North, and which Pitt had determined to quell. First, he brought in a general measure against smuggling, with some new or more stringent regulations. Thus the right of seizing vessels allowed to the revenue officers under certain circumstances of suspicion was extended from the distance of two to four leagues from the shore. But these were only palliatives, and Pitt was bent upon striking at the very root of the evil. 'It has appeared to the Committee of this House,' he said, 'that the best possible plan for the purpose is to lower the duty on tea to such a degree as to take away from the smuggler all temptation to his illicit trade; and this idea has my hearty approval.' In the discussion which ensued Pitt said of Lord Mahon that his Noble Friend had an especial right to speak on this subject, since it was he who 'originally suggested the reduction of duties as beneficial to the revenue.'

In pursuance of the plan which his speech had indicated, the Minister proposed that the duties on tea, which brought in upwards of 700,000*l.* yearly, should be reduced so far that they might probably yield no more than 169,000*l.* To set against these diminished duties there was the certain decline of smuggling, so that the fair trader would no longer be exposed to any unequal competition. There would be, however, in the first instance, a considerable loss to the revenue, which Pitt proposed to supply by means of a new impost—'the Commutation Tax,' as it was afterwards called—namely, an additional duty upon all houses above the poorest kind, estimated according to the number of their windows.

This scheme found great favour both with Parliament and with the public, and was carried through by an overpowering majority. It was obviously much in favour of the poorest classes, since they were relieved from the old tax upon tea without being made subject to the new tax upon windows. Fox, however, raised an objection to the new plan as being compulsory—that is, as obliging every householder above the lower rank to pay an equivalent for drinking tea, whether he drank it or not. But this argument, though specious in theory, was deemed to carry no great weight, since in point of fact at that time there was scarce a family in the kingdom, rich or poor, in which tea of some kind was not every day consumed. So vast had been the change since the days of Locke, who but a century before speaks of tea by its French designation of 'Thé,' and enumerates it among the 'foreign drinks' to be found in the London coffee-houses.[1]

Exactly the same principle was applied by Pitt to the similar case of spirits. Here again fraudulent devices had spread so wide that, for instance, the distillery from molasses in the city of London, which had yielded to the revenue 32,000*l.* in 1778, produced no more than 1,098*l.* in 1783. The Minister therefore brought in and carried a measure regulating the duties upon British, and greatly reducing those upon foreign spirits. But expecting as the result a considerable increase of consumption in spirits legally imported, he did not think it necessary as in the case of tea to propose any new impost as a substitute.

These might be called the preliminary measures. But on the 30th of June Pitt unfolded his entire plan of finance--the first of those luminous and masterly Budgets which were heard in the House of Commons year by year so long as he continued Minister, and which had not been equalled by any of his predecessors. Hard and irksome was the task, he said, to propose not only new taxes but also a new loan in the second year of peace. But the necessities of the State made that task his duty, and for these necessities others, and not he, had to answer. The floating or unfunded debt he estimated at fourteen millions. Pitt was very desirous to fund the whole of this sum in the present Session, but he was assured by the monied men that so large a quantity of stock coming at once into the market must greatly depress the other public securities, and prevent them from supplying the new loan on favourable terms. 'After an arduous effort for the whole,' said Pitt, 'I was obliged to compound the business, and therefore I propose to fund only six millions and a half of the unfunded fourteen millions.'

'It was always my idea'—thus in his great speech the Minister continues—'that a fund at a high rate of interest is better to the country than those at low rates; that a four per cent. is preferable to a three per cent., and a five per cent. better than a four. The reason is that in all operations of finance we should always have in view a plan of redemption. Gradually to redeem and to extinguish our debt ought ever to be the wise pursuit of Government. Every scheme and operation of finance should be directed to that end, and managed with that view.'

Such a maxim might at that time be regarded as a considerable innovation on established views. Not less novel was the course which Pitt announced himself to have pursued with respect to the loan of six millions he required. Former Ministers had made such loans a source of patronage—the means of gain to their friends and followers. Pitt loftily resolved to consult the public interest only. He gave notice through the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank that he was ready to contract for the loan with those who would offer the lowest terms, and that the lottery tickets should be distributed among the persons who lent the money, in proportion to the sums lent. The sealed tenders which were sent in accordingly were opened in the presence of the Governor and Deputy Governor. Pitt at once accepted the terms that were the lowest; and as he assured the House of Commons, on his honour, not one shilling was retained for distribution in his hands. The example thus set has served as a precedent and model in all loans of later times.

It is worthy of note, in passing, how different was the spirit which Lord Rockingham and Lord John Cavendish upon the one part, or Pitt upon the other, applied to questions of finance. The danger of undue influence by allowing to Members of Parliament any share in the contracts for loans and lotteries was acknowledged on all sides. Rockingham and Cavendish dealt with this evil by pruning its branches—by a Bill to prohibit every contractor from sitting in the House of Commons. Pitt dealt with this evil by striking at its roots—by providing that every contract should be free from any possible admixture of party favour.

Reverting to the first Budget of the new Minister, we find him in his speech enumerate the Army Estimates for the year as upwards of four millions, the Navy as upwards of three millions, the Ordnance as upwards of 600,000*l*. The Miscellaneous Services would amount to nearly 300,000*l*., including a large arrear, which Pitt had the painful duty of announcing, in the Civil List. The interest of the National Debt in all its manifold denominations might be taken at nine millions. On the other hand the revenue would fall short of the required charges by no less than 900,000*l*., and Pitt proposed to supply the deficiency at once and boldly by the imposition of new duties. 'Irksome as is my task this day,' he said, 'the necessities of the country call upon me not to shrink from it; and I confide in the good sense and the patriotism of the people of England.' He added, as the maxim which he designed to follow as Minister of the Finances, 'to disguise nothing from the public.'

The taxes proposed by Pitt to yield what he termed —and what, according to the estimates of that time, he might well term—this 'enormous sum,' were upon hats, ribbons, and gauzes, coals not employed in certain branches of our manufactures, horses not employed in husbandry, an additional duty upon linens and calicoes, an additional duty of one halfpenny in the pound upon candles, upon licences to dealers in exciseable commodities, certificates for killing game, paper, hackney-coaches, and bricks and tiles. According to Pitt's estimate the yearly consumption of bricks was about three hundred millions, and of these one hundred and five were used in and near London alone. All these intended imposts he explained and defended at length, in the course of his speech, with so much perspicuity and knowledge of details as might justly delight his friends, and in the same measure disconcert his adversaries.

In pursuance of the views which his speech explained, Pitt on the same evening moved no less than 133 Resolutions of Finance. He added several others on subsequent days, on all which numerous Bills were founded. His new taxes passed for the most part with little difficulty, excepting that on coals, which was assailed by so many and so strong objections that the Minister consented to withdraw it, substituting several other small imposts or new regulations in its place.

To the tax on bricks and tiles there was also some demur. Lord Mahon assailed it in a speech of considerable violence, and he went on to denounce the arguments of Mr. George Rose in its support as 'the most weak, ridiculous, and absurd that could be advanced.' It was the manifest duty of Pitt to defend his own Secretary of the Treasury. He retorted in a strain of irony on Lord Mahon; and this appears to have been the first estrangement between these so lately most cordial friends.

Several of the new financial regulations which Pitt was proposing applied to the privilege of franking by Peers and Members of Parliament. Up to that time nothing beyond the signature of the person privileged had been required, nor was there any limit as to place or number. Several banking firms especially were possessed of whole box-fulls of blank covers signed by some friend or partner, and kept ready for use in their affairs. Letters were constantly addressed to some Member, at places where he never resided, so that by a secret arrangement other persons might receive them post-free. It was computed, though probably with some exaggeration, that the loss to the revenue by such means might amount every year to no less than 170,000*l.* By new rules it came to be provided that no Member of either House should be entitled to frank more than ten letters daily, each of these to bear in his own handwriting, besides his signature, the day of the month and year, the name of the post-town, and the entire address; nor were any letters to be received by him post-free except at his actual abode. These regulations, which continued in force until the final abolition of Parliamentary franks in 1839, were carefully framed, and productive of considerable savings. Yet no amount of public forethought is ever quite a match for private skill, and many cases of most ingenious evasion are recorded. Thus on one occasion the franks of a Scottish Member, Sir John Hope, having been counterfeited, the person accused on that account protested that he had done no more than write at the edge of his own letters, 'Free I hope.' A Peer with whom I was acquainted is said to have franked the news of his own decease—that is, having died suddenly one morning, and left some covers to friends ready written on his own escritoire, his family availed themselves of these to enclose the melancholy tidings.

The arrear of the Civil List, first made known by the Prime Minister in his speech upon the Budget, was afterwards more formally communicated by a message from the King. It amounted to 60,000*l.*, which was voted with no opposition, and with little remark.

It is worthy of note that the Appropriation Act of this year was framed to include the supplies voted in the preceding as well as in the present Session. It passed quietly through, without a word of remonstrance, or even of remark. No Bill of Indemnity to Ministers was either solicited by themselves or called for by their opponents. Thus worthless was the Resolution which the last House of Commons had carried on this subject! So completely had all the threats antecedent to the Dissolution fallen to the ground!

Next in importance to the settlement of the finances, stood the question of the government of India. On the 6th of July Pitt brought in and explained his new measure for that object. It differed but little from the scheme which he had laid before the last Parliament at the beginning of the year, and by establishing a 'Board of Control' laid the foundation of that system of double government for India which, with some modifications, continued till the Act of 1858. Every possible objection was urged against it by Fox and Burke, by Sheridan, and by Philip Francis, who had now for the first time obtained a seat in the House of Commons. But they had little success. In the only division which they ventured to try upon the general principle, no more than 60 Members were found to oppose the Bill, while 271 voted in its favour. And it passed still more smoothly through the House of Lords.

Another question, prolific of debates, was the Westminster Scrutiny. It called forth one of the most admirable and least imperfectly reported of the many admirable speeches of Fox. The High Bailiff defended himself at the bar. Witnesses were examined and counsel heard. Among these, Erskine, now no longer in Parliament, summed up the case on Fox's side. At last the House by a large majority affirmed the legal character of the Scrutiny, and directed that it should proceed with all possible despatch—a most unhappy decision for the interests of all the parties concerned. 'I have had a variety of calculations made upon this Scrutiny,' said Fox in his great speech of the 8th of June, 'and the lowest of all the estimates is 18,000*l.*' It is said that Pitt was misled upon this question by the authority of Sir Lloyd Kenyon, the new Master of the Rolls.[1]

The last measure of this Session had the rare good fortune of being supported from all sides. On the 2nd of August Dundas brought in a Bill to restore to the rightful heirs the estates in Scotland which had been forfeited in consequence of the last rebellion. The return, said Dundas, to a more conciliatory system was commenced by the late Lord Chatham, who with admirable judgment and most complete success had raised regiments of Highlanders to fight the battles of our common country, declaring that he sought only for merit, and had found it in the mountains of the North. 'It is an auspicious omen,' thus Dundas proceeded, 'that the first blow to this proscription was given by the Earl of Chatham, and may well justify a hope that its remains will be annihilated under the administration of his son, who will thus complete the good work that his great father began. But let me not be understood to mean that my Right Hon. friend has the sole merit of the present measure. In justice to the Noble Lord in the blue riband (Lord North), I must say that, having conversed with him several times on the subject while he was at the head of affairs, I always found him disposed to act in that business upon the most liberal, generous, and manly principles. I found precisely the same favourable disposition in the Ministers who immediately preceded the present; and I know that had they remained longer in office, they would have brought forward the same proposal as I have now to make.'

[1] Nichols's Recollections during the Reign of George the Third, vol. ii. p. 151.

Accordingly Fox rose to express his continued and hearty approval of the scheme, and it passed the House of Commons without even a whisper of objection. Nor was it resisted in the Lords. There, however, it provoked from the Chancellor a peevish burst of spleen, the cause of which may perhaps be detected at the outset of his speech, when he 'lamented, as a private man, that he had not heard anything of the project of bringing the measure before Parliament till it had actually been brought in.' He declared that he did not mean to vote against the Bill, and contented himself with drawing in array against it a great number of doubts and scruples.

In the course of this Session Alderman Sawbridge brought forward a motion for Reform in Parliament. Pitt, Wilberforce, and others endeavoured to dissuade him on account of the pressure of other business. 'In my opinion,' said Pitt, 'it is greatly out of season at this juncture. But I have the measure much at heart, and I pledge myself in the strongest language to bring it forward the very first opportunity next Session.' Nevertheless the Alderman persisted, and a long debate ensued. The motion was rejected by 199 votes against 125, Pitt himself being one of the minority.

On the 20th of August this short but busy Session, the second of the year, was closed with a brief speech by the King in person.

On the 3rd of September following, the new India Board was published. It was intended that the substantial power should remain wholly in the hands of Dundas; but the arrangement was not effected without some difficulties on the part of the other Commissioners, as will appear from a letter which one of them addressed at this time to Mr. Pitt, complaining above all of the undue number of Scotch appointments.

Albemarle Street, Sept. 24, 1784.

Dear Sir,—I went into the Closet to-day to carry in the business of the various departments which now fall upon my very inefficient shoulders. To begin with the War Office, upon the business of which I thought it necessary to say something, in consequence of a letter which I received from Sir John Wrottesley. . . .

. . . Moore cannot, I find, come in upon any vacancy in the first regiment of Guards, as he has behaved in a strange manner to the commanding officer of that regiment upon the subject of a Court Martial held upon his brother, who was a surgeon's mate. This I had from the King. I do not think His Majesty much edified with the keen appetite and quick digestion of the Phipps family.

So much for military matters. As to the subject upon which you know how much I hate to talk, and upon which I wish I could never think, His Majesty asked me what the Directors meant?—the question of all others to which I was most incompetent to answer. I could have referred him to others who are masters of the subject, but I find that you sent him only the Resolution of the Directors. He asked why they thought that no one above the rank of Major-General could command in chief, and how they came to ask the question whether it is inconsistent or not for a Lieutenant-General to be under the command of a Major-General.

I have this moment received your note. I cannot say how much it hurts me. My opinions as much as my feelings are against the step that is taken, and what I am most concerned about is that you will be imagined to have been a party to this business. I am sure you are not. You will find a combination of the most insatiable ambition and the most sordid avarice and villany at the bottom of this base work. As to the men with whom I have hitherto treated, very imprudently, with great openness, while I have a bolt to my door they shall never come into my room. I must be allowed to show myself not to be their accomplice.

I enclose you a list of the field-officers in India, to show you the drift of that intended operation upon the King's troops in India with which so many persons have acquainted me. I believe three are as many English or Irish names as there are among them. I will leave the subject, as I feel it difficult to suppress my sense of my own situation.

Let me off from any connection with this Indian business. I am ready to abandon it to the ambition of those who like the department. But I must have the rest of my department, while I hold it, unencroached upon by others. I hope you will not suppose yourself included in this last sentence, as I shall always look upon the patronage of my office as yours.

Assure yourself that, hurt and disgraced as I feel myself, I am, with great and unalterable truth and regard, &c.,

SYDNEY.

During the remainder of this year Pitt continued to apply himself most earnestly to the finances. He lived for the most part within easy reach of London, in a house which he had hired upon Putney Heath. Sometimes he indulged himself with one or two days at Brighton, or, as it was then called, Brighthelmstone. But he found it necessary to relinquish the longer journey to Burton Pynsent which he had designed.

The letters of Pitt to Lady Chatham from the time that he became Prime Minister appear less numerous and also of smaller interest. He appears to have felt it his duty in his new station to refrain from writing to her upon State affairs, except in rare cases and in general terms. His correspondence, therefore, turns chiefly on family matters. But he was most anxious and unremitting in attention whenever any point arose in which her comfort was concerned, as the following extracts from his letters will clearly show :—

Everything continues to prosper here. I only wish you were a nearer spectator, and that I could have an opportunity of telling you all you would like to hear.

Downing Street, May 6, 1784.

With regard to the $4\frac{1}{2}$ Fund itself, I still retain my opinion that it will in no very distant time become again adequate to all it is to pay; but in the meantime I feel more than I can express the continuance of the inconvenience to which you are subjected by the delay. The best measure that I see in the present circumstances is that which, independent of any views of our own, must, I believe, take place; and if it does, it will, I think, be an effectual relief. That is an application to Parliament, stating the arrears of the fund and the cause of the deficiency, and desiring that the charge now upon it may be carried to the general fund of the revenue of the Customs. I believe if this is properly done, there will be no difficulty in it; and such a plan is in forwardness on the part of the agents of the West India governors. In the interval, there is one thing I must most anxiously beg of you—not to entertain an idea of contracting any further in the present moment your own establishment, which is indeed too narrow to admit of more economy. What Harriot said to me on this subject makes me press this request. I have the fullest persuasion that the thing will finally be put on a satisfactory footing, and I hope it may soon. But while we wait for this, which is a debt from the public, we have some of us what may in part serve in lieu of it. I assure you I shall be a rich man enough myself (while we continue in a state which seems to have every prospect of permanence) to give me a right to beg you to be at ease with regard to any exceeding that may be incurred while the suspense continues. I hope you will be good enough to believe that whatever concerns your satisfaction, more immediately concerns my own than any articles that consume the salary of the Treasury. What I beg you to believe also, is that my means, though they will not reach at the extent of my wishes on this point, will without a moment's difficulty go some way to it. I am sure you will forgive the haste in which I write, and believe that I have not time to express half what I feel on the subject. But before I end, I must repeat how anxiously I beg you, if you will let me urge it for my own comfort, not to let the delay of this business give you any additional uneasiness, and above all not to think of putting yourself to any fresh inconvenience or restraint. I will pledge myself for your finding ultimately no reason for it.

Downing Street, May 29, 1784.

My dear Mother,—I have had but one thing to complain of in the prosperous course of this busy time—that I have really been obliged day by day to relinquish my intention of writing to you, though every moment of delay was mortifying to me, more than I can express, knowing the suspense which it occasioned to you. I had also some inquiries to make before I could ascertain the present means of furnishing the accommodation, which I so much wish I could render perfectly complete. I trust in a little while our home Treasury will be punctual enough in its payments to leave no difficulty in making up, in some measure, the irregularity of other funds. The income of the Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer together will really furnish more than my expenses can require; and I hope I need not say the surplus will give me more satisfaction than all the rest, if it can contribute to diminish embarrassment where least of all any ought, I am sure, to subsist. In the meantime, as even our payments are in some arrear, I cannot in the instant answer for all I could wish. But let me beg you to have the goodness to name what sum is necessary to the exigencies of the present moment, and I am sure of being able to supply it. I shall without any other steps have 600*l.* paid into Mr. Coutts's hands the day after to-morrow, and will immediately direct whatever part of it you will allow to be placed to your account. If anything more is necessary, pray let me know the extent of it. I have no doubt of finding means, if they are wanting, at present; though, for the reasons I have related, the facility may be greater a little while hence. I should add that I still continue to think some effectual arrangement may take place as to the 4½ Fund, or a productive substitute for it. Forgive the haste in which I am obliged to write, and have the goodness to let me hear from you as soon as you conveniently can. The mode I have mentioned will enable you to draw on Mr. Coutts without trouble, and I think is the easiest, unless any other occurs to you. Believe me, my dear Mother, &c., W. PITT.

Putney Heath, August 28, 1784.

The end of the Session has hardly yet given me anything like leisure, as the continual hurry of some months leaves of course no small arrear of business now to be despatched. I hope, however, in about ten days, or possibly a week, to be able to get as far as Brighthelmstone. My brother has, I believe, written to tell Harriot that a house is secured. I shall be happy to see her either in Downing Street or there the first moment she pleases. I am already in a great measure a country gentleman, because, though full of business, it is of a nature which I can do as well at Putney, from whence I now write, as in town. I look forward with impatience to being enough released to be with you at Burton, and work the more cheerfully in hopes of it.

Putney Heath, October 7, 1784.

I have not been without some useful and agreeable mixture of idleness in my Brighthelmstone excursions, though in them I have had pretty constant experience that I could not afford more than a day's distance from town. I have been for a good while engaged to a large party which was to take place, for two or three days about this time, at a famous place of Mr. Drummond's in the New Forest. But as the party was to be made up principally of the Treasury and the new India Board, it is not very certain that the business of one or the other will not prevent it. The principal cause of my being detained at present is the expectation of materials from Ireland, and persons to consult with from that country, on the subject of all the unsettled commercial points, which will furnish a good deal of employment for next Session. The scene there is the most important and delicate we now have to attend to, but even there I think things wear a more favourable aspect.

December 24, 1784.

I have deferred from time to time saying anything respecting the grant, hoping to have the opportunity of talking it over fully. I hope, however, that I may safely beg you to be at ease upon it; for though I cannot at this moment say precisely what mode must be taken, I am convinced the business may be soon satisfactorily settled. I shall feel too much interested on what so nearly concerns that which has the first claim to my attention, not to take care that it shall be early adjusted. The only thing you must allow me to beg and insist on, is that you will in the interval feel no difficulty in calling for whatever you find necessary from Mr. Coutts. I hope you know that while it is accidentally in my power to diminish a moment's embarrassment or uneasiness to you, the doing so is the object the most important to my happiness. Inconvenience, if it existed, ought to be out of the question with me; but I can assure you very sincerely that it cannot be produced in the slightest degree by your consulting your own ease and my pleasure in the interval that now remains.

During the autumn there were two considerable promotions in the Peerage. No Marquisate was at that time remaining in England. The title of Lord Winchester was merged in the Dukedom of Bolton, and the title of Lord Rockingham had become extinct at his death. Pitt now resolved to raise to the vacant rank two noblemen, one of whom had high claims on himself, and the other high claims on the King. On the same day in November the Earl of Shelburne became Marquis of Lansdowne, and Earl Temple Marquis of Buckingham. Of the former, we find the Duke of Rutland write confidentially to Pitt as follows in the previous June:—'I have reason to believe that though he (Lord Shelburne) has entirely relinquished all views of business and office, yet some mark of distinction such as a step in the Peerage would be peculiarly gratifying to him.'[1]

Similar hints may perhaps have come from Lord Temple's friends. It is even probable, as I have shown elsewhere, that he aspired to the highest rank. His eager wish in December, 1783, seems to have been baffled only by the resolute refusal of the King. The letter of Pitt to Lord Temple—which is not in my possession, but which I have seen—offering him a Marquisate in November, 1784, goes on to say that his claim to a Dukedom should be considered in the event of His Majesty ever granting any more patents of that title. I have been informed that the letter to Lord Shelburne of the same date conveys the same assurance.

On the 1st of December Pitt was most highly gratified by an important accession to his ranks. Lord Camden, though from the weight of years unwilling to engage once more in active life, would no longer refuse to join the son of Chatham. He consented to take the office of President of the Council, which Earl Gower gave up for his sake, receiving in return the Privy Seal, left vacant by the Duke of Rutland. It was also designed, and indeed made a condition by Lord Camden, that his intimate friend the Duke of Grafton should become a member of the Cabinet. From various causes His Grace postponed his decision for a considerable time. At last the affair of Ockzakow arising, he finally declined.

During the administration of Lord North it had been usual to convene Parliament in the month of November. But under Pitt the custom was changed. Unless in special cases, the Houses did not meet till after the New Year. Thus in 1784, at the time of which I speak, the opening of the new Session was appointed for the 25th of January, 1785.

CHAPTER VII.

While thus throughout the country parties were fiercely contending, we may desire to consult the more dispassionate opinion of an Englishman of superior intellect residing at a distance from England. It is, therefore, with especial pleasure that I insert the following letter. I owe the communication of it, and of several others, to the kindness of my friend the present and third Earl of St. Germans.

Mr. Gibbon to Lord Eliot.

Lausanne, Oct. 27, 1784.

Since my leaving England, in the short period of last winter, what strange events have fallen out in your political world! It is probable, from your present connections, that we see them with very different eyes; and, on this occasion, I very much distrust my own judgment. I am too far distant to have a perfect knowledge of the revolution, and am too recently absent to judge of it without partiality. Yet let me soberly ask you on Whig principles, whether it be not a dangerous discovery that the King can keep his favourite Minister against a majority of the House of Commons? Here, indeed (for even here we are politicians), the people were violent against Fox, but I think it was chiefly those who have imbibed in the French service a high reverence for the person and authority of Kings. They are likewise biassed by the splendour of young Pitt, and it is a fair and honourable prejudice. A youth of five-and-twenty, who raises himself to the government of an empire by the power of genius and the reputation of virtue, is a circumstance unparalleled in history, and, in a general view, is not less glorious to the country than to himself.

At the time when Gibbon wrote thus, Pitt had not merely secured his high position by his triumph at the General Election. He had done much more. He had brought into order the finances of the country, and found the public favour stand firm against that most trying of all tests, the imposition of new taxes. He had decided and settled for seventy years to come that most anxious and perplexing of all questions—the principle of our government in India. At this period, the autumn of 1784, 'he was,' says Lord Macaulay, 'the greatest subject that England had seen during many generations. His father had never been so powerful, nor Walpole, nor Marlborough.'

It is no less true, and this should above all be noted, that the high supremacy which even at this distance of time may dazzle us, never seems to have dazzled the 'boy-statesman,' as his opponents loved to call him, of twenty-five. Young as he was, and victorious as he had become, he was never tempted to presume upon his genius, or relax in his application. He continued, as I have just now shown him, through all the recess of 1784, seldom allowing himself any holiday, and earnestly intent on business for the coming Session.

But before I pass on to the events of that Session, and of many Sessions more in which Pitt and Fox continued to confront each other, I will attempt to draw a parallel in some detail between these two most eminent men, towering, as each did, high above the rest in the opposite ranks. As to Pitt, there could be no idea of competition with any of his colleagues; and as to Fox, though there stood beside him such men—hardly else to be paralleled—as Burke, as Sheridan, as North, yet, as Bishop Tomline says, 'in conversation with me, I always noticed that Mr. Pitt considered Mr. Fox as far superior to any other of his opponents as a debater in the House of Commons.'

Charles James Fox being born in January, 1749, was older than Pitt by upwards of ten years. Each was the younger and the favourite son of a retired Minister. Each grew up amidst the sanguine expectations of his father's friends. But in their training they were wide as the poles asunder. Pitt, as we have seen, was brought up by Lord Chatham in habits of active study, and his mind was cultivated with unremitting care. Fox, on the other hand, had the great misfortune of a too indulgent father. It is clear from the letters published that the first Lord Holland connived at—it might almost be said that he abetted and encouraged—the early excesses of his son. The gaming-tables at Spa and elsewhere became familiar to young Fox even in his teens. His losses, his debts, his drinking bouts, and his amours were the theme of fashionable scandal.

Such had been the life of Fox, far more through the fault of others than his own, when at the age of nineteen the burgage tenures of Midhurst first sent him to the House of Commons.

Pitt and Fox, as they grew up, differed greatly in aspect and in frame. The tall, lank figure, and the lofty bearing of the former might often be contrasted with Fox's increasing corpulence, and gay, good-humoured mien. With these, or the exaggerations of these, the caricatures of that day have made us all familiar. Caricatures, so far at least as any wide diffusion of the prints is concerned, may be said to have begun in the last days of Sir Robert Walpole. But it was not until the coalition of Fox and North—a most tempting subject for satire—that they, and above all such as came from the pencil of Gillray, attained any high degree of merit. With their merit so likewise grew their political importance. It is said that Mr. Fox was wont to ascribe in part the unpopularity stirred against him on his East India Bill to the impression produced by Sayer's caricatures, especially 'Carlo Khan's Triumphal Entry into Leadenhall Street;' and 'A Transfer of East India Stock.' 'They have done me more mischief,' he said, 'than the debates in Parliament.'[1]

In able hands the pen may be almost as graphic as the pencil. Thus, for instance, does Horace Walpole describe the eloquent framer of the India Bill about the very time when that Bill was framed: 'Fox lodged in St. James's Street, and as soon as he rose, which was very late, had a levee of his followers, and of the members of the gaming-club at Brooks's—all his disciples. His bristly black person and shagged breast quite open, and rarely purified by any ablutions, was wrapped in a foul linen night-gown, and his bushy hair dishevelled. In these Cynic weeds, and with Epicurean good humour, did he dictate his politics, and in this school did the Heir of the Crown attend his lessons and imbibe them.' The value of this portrait is enhanced from the judgment formed upon it by one of Fox's relatives and most warm admirers—his nephew, Lord Holland. He speaks of it as, of course, a strong caricature; 'yet,' he adds, 'from my boyish recollection of a morning in St. James's Street, I must needs acknowledge that it has some truth to recommend it.'[1]

Take as a side-piece the portrait of Pitt as he appeared in 1783 to a Member of Parliament who was garrulous and inexact, and extremely sore as disappointed in his hopes of office, but still keen-eyed and observant. Sir Nathaniel Wraxall, to whom I am referring, speaks as follows: 'In the formation of his person he was tall and slender, but without elegance or grace. In his manners, if not repulsive, he was cold, stiff, and without suavity or amenity. He seemed never to invite approach, or to encourage acquaintance, though when addressed he could be polite, communicative, and occasionally gracious. Smiles were not natural to him even when seated on the Treasury Bench. . . . . From the instant that Pitt entered the door-way of the House of Commons, he advanced up the floor with a quick and firm step, his head erect and thrown back, looking neither to the right nor to the left, nor favouring with a nod or a glance any of the individuals seated on either side, among whom many who possessed 5,000*l.* a-year would have been gratified even by so slight a mark of attention. It was not thus that Lord North or Fox treated Parliament.'[2]

In vigour of frame, as in outward aspect, the two statesmen differed greatly. The health of Pitt, as I have shown, was very delicate in his early youth, and it again became so ere he had passed the prime of manhood. Fox, on the contrary, had been gifted by nature with a buoyant spirit and a most robust constitution. For a long time even his own irregularities could not impair it, and he used to say that a spoonful of rhubarb was sufficient remedy for all the bodily ills that he had ever known. As a proof of his youthful vigour, it is recorded by tradition at Killarney that at twenty-two years of age he twice swam round a lake upon a mountain summit of large extent and of icy coldness, called 'the Devil's Punch-Bowl.' Mr. Herbert, of Mucross, was his host on that occasion, and it is added that some months afterwards, meeting that gentleman in London, he asked him, 'Pray tell me—is that shower I left at Killarney over yet?'

So far as regards mental culture on other subjects than on politics, Pitt and Fox were exactly opposite in their position. Pitt had received a most excellent education, but from early office had afterwards little leisure for reading. Fox in his youth had read only by snatches, and it is greatly to his credit that he had read at all. When, however, his Coalition Ministry fell, and when a long period of exile from Downing Street loomed before him, he applied himself often with excellent effect and most unaffected relish to literary studies.

The best classic authors in Greek and Latin were to Fox a never-failing source of recreation. In these he might be equalled or indeed surpassed by Pitt, but as to modern literature there could be no kind of comparison between them. Pitt never carried any further his colloquial studies of Rheims and Fontainebleau. But Fox, besides some knowledge of Spanish, had made himself perfect master of both the French and Italian languages. It was partly for this reason that he took especial pleasure in foreign affairs.

It is said—and even the personal tastes of a great man may be to us a matter of interest—that Ovid was the poet Fox loved the best among the Latin poets, and

Euripides among the Greek tragedians. For poetry in every language he had indeed a great predilection, and for poetry in English he had talent as well as taste. His own attempts in it were only of a cursory kind. Yet, slight as the praise may seem to certain ponderous writers of unread dissertations, he is said to be the author of perhaps the very best, and the truest, enigma in the English language:—

> My first does affliction denote,
> Which my second is destined to feel,
> My whole is the best antidote
> That sorrow to soften and heal.

Here is another, scarcely less excellent, which is also ascribed to him:—

> Formed long ago, though made to-day,
> I'm most employed when others sleep;
> What few would wish to give away,
> And none would ever wish to keep.

In his retirement, one of the projects that he fondly cherished was to prepare a new and improved edition of the works of his favourite Dryden. 'Oh!'—he exclaims, in the familiar correspondence of his later years—'oh! how I wish that I could make up my mind to think it right to devote all the remaining part of my life to such subjects, and such only! Indeed, I rather think I shall.'

In prose compositions Fox was far less happy. His private letters indeed deserve the praise of a clear, frank, and perfectly unaffected style. But his pen lacked pinions for a higher flight. During the last years of his life he began with great care and pains to write the History of England at the period of the Revolution, and the work, so far as it had proceeded, was published by Lord Holland after Fox's decease. Universal disappointment—such was the impression that this fragment made. No trace of the great orator can be discovered in the narrative; scarce any in the comments and reflections. It was found that, besides the natural defects of his written style, Fox had entangled himself with some most needless and fantastic rules of his own devising—as, for instance, to use no word which his favourite Dryden had not used before.

Pitt, besides his boyish tragedy, made no attempt in authorship. But parts of his correspondence, written on great emergencies, and to eminent men, seem to me of admirable power. I know of no models more perfect for State Papers than his letter to the King of January 31, 1801, or his letter to Lord Melville of March 29, 1804.

It is a harder as well as a more important task to compare the two great rivals in their main point of rivalry—in public speaking. Each may at once be placed in the very highest class. Fox would have been without doubt or controversy the first orator of his age had it not been for Pitt. Pitt would have been without doubt or controversy the first orator of his age had it not been for Fox. It may fairly be left in question which of these two pre-eminent speakers should bear away the palm. But they were magis pares quam similes—far rather equal than alike. Mr. Windham, himself a great master of debate, and a keen observer of others' oratory, used to say that Pitt always seemed to him as if he could make a King's speech off hand. There was the same self-conscious dignity—the same apt choice of language—the same stately and guarded phrase. Yet this, although his more common and habitual style, did not preclude some passages of pathetic eloquence, and many of pointed reply. He loved on some occasions to illustrate his meaning with citations from the Latin poets—sometimes giving a new grace to well-known passages of Horace and Virgil, and sometimes drawing a clear stream from an almost hidden spring—as when, in reference to the execution of Louis the Sixteenth, he cited the lines of a poet so little read as Statius, lines which he noticed as applied by De Thou to the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Never, even on the most sudden call on him to rise—did he seem to hesitate for a word, or to take any but the most apt to the occasion. His sentences, however long, and even when catching up a parenthesis as they proceeded, were always brought to a right and regular close—a much rarer merit in a public speaker than might be supposed by those who judge of Parliamentary debates only by the morning papers. I could give a strong instance of the contrary. I could name a veteran Member, whom I used, when I sat in the House of Commons, constantly to hear on all financial subjects. Of him I noticed, that while the sentences which he spoke might be reckoned by the hundred, those which he ever finished could only be reckoned by the score.

It is worthy of note, however, that carefully as Pitt had been trained by his illustrious father, their style of oratory and their direction of knowledge were not only different, but almost, it may be said, opposite. Chatham excelled in fiery bursts of eloquence—Pitt in a luminous array of arguments. On no point was Pitt so strong as on finance—on none was Chatham so weak.

Fox, as I have heard good judges say, had the same defects, which, in an exaggerated form, and combined with many of his merits, appeared in his nephew Lord Holland. He neither had, nor aimed at, any graces of manner or of elocution. He would often pause for a word, and still oftener for breath and utterance, panting as it were, and heaving with the mighty thoughts that he felt arise. But these defects, considerable as they would have been in any mere holiday speaker, were overborne by his masculine mind, and wholly forgotten by his audience as they witnessed the cogency of his keen replies—the irresistible home-thrust of his arguments. No man that has addressed any public assembly in ancient or in modern times was ever more truly and emphatically a great debater. Careless of himself, flinging aside all preconceived ideas or studied flights, he struck with admirable energy full at the foe before him. The blows which he dealt upon his adversaries were such as few among them could withstand, perhaps only one among them could parry: they seemed all the heavier, as wholly unprepared, and arising from the speeches that had gone before. Nor did he ever attempt to glide over, or pass by, an argument that told against him; he would meet it boldly face to face, and grapple with it undeterred. In like manner any quotations that he made from Latin or English authors did not seem brought in upon previous reflection for the adornment of the subject at its surface, but rather appeared to grow up spontaneously from its inmost depths. With all his wonderful powers of debate, and perhaps as a consequence of them, there was something truly noble and impressive in the entire absence of all artifice or affectation. His occasional bursts of true inborn sturdy genuine feeling, and the frequent indications of his kindly and generous temper, would sometimes, even in the fiercest party conflicts, come home to the hearts of his opponents. If, as is alleged, he was wont to repeat the same thoughts again and again in different words, this might be a defect in the oration, but it was none in the orator. For, thinking not of himself, nor of the rules of rhetoric, but only of success in the struggle, he had found these the most effectual means to imbue a popular audience almost imperceptibly with his own opinions. And he knew that to the multitude one argument stated in five different forms is, in general, held equal to five new arguments.

The familiar correspondence of Fox, as edited with ability and candour by Lord John Russell, has not tended on the whole to exalt his fame. Such, at least, is the opinion which I have heard expressed with sincere regret by some persons greatly prepossessed in his favour—some members of the families most devoted to his party cause. It seems to be felt, that although a perusal of his letters leaves in its full lustre his reputation as an orator, it has greatly dimmed his reputation as a statesman. There are, in his correspondence, some hasty things that are by no means favourable to his public spirit, as where he speaks of the 'delight' which he derived from the news of our disasters at Saratoga and at York-town.[1] There are some hasty things that are as far from favourable to his foresight and sagacity. Take, for instance, a prophecy as follows, in 1801 :—'According to my notion the House of Commons has in a great measure ceased, and will shortly entirely cease, to be a place of much importance.'[2] Perhaps, also, after the perusal of these letters, we may feel more strongly than before it that many parts of Fox's public conduct—as his separation from Lord Shelburne, or his junction with Lord North—are hard to be defended.

But on this point there is one reflection that we should always bear in mind. The more we dwell on Fox's errors the higher we are bound to rank those eminent qualities by which, in the opinion of so many of his contemporaries, his errors were outweighed. In spite of all his errors—and what is much more trying, in spite of the party reverses and discomfiture which proceeded from them—we find his friends, comprising some of the most gifted men of that age, adhere to him, except in one memorable crisis—the period of 1794—with fond admiration and unhesitating confidence.

Of this attachment on the part of his friends I have seen a striking instance on the walls of All Saints' Church at Hertford. In that church lies buried Lord John Townshend, who died in February, 1833. The inscription on his monument terms him 'the friend and companion of Mr. Fox; a distinction which was the pride of his life, and the only one he was desirous might be recorded after his death.'

As the cause of this enduring attachment on the part of Fox's friends, we may acknowledge in a great degree his wondrous powers of mind, but chiefly, and above all, his winning warmth of heart. How delightful must Fox have been as a companion! How frank, how rich, how varied his flow of conversation! How high the privilege to visit him in the country retreat that he loved so well—of sitting by his side beneath the cedars that he planted at St. Ann's! With what schoolboy fun would the retired statesman at such times rally his own short fits of utter idleness! Thus when Mr. Rogers once said that it was delightful to lie on the grass with a book in one's hand all day, we are told that Fox answered, 'Yes—but why with a book?'[1] How genial his aspect, as I have heard it described by another associate of his later years—walking slow, and with gouty feet, along his garden-alleys, but with cheerful countenance and joyous tones—expanding his ample breast to draw in the fresh breeze, and exclaiming from time to time, 'Oh, how fine a thing is life!'—'Oh, how glorious a thing is summer weather!'

Several testimonies which I have already cited speak of Pitt in his earlier years as a most delightful companion, abounding in wit and mirth, and with a flow of lively spirits. As the cares of office grew upon him, he went of course much less into general society. He would often, for whole hours, ride or sit with only Steele, or Rose, or Dundas for his companion. Nor was this merely from the ease and rest of thus unbending his mind. Men who know the general habits of great Ministers are well aware how many details may be expedited and difficulties smoothed away by quiet chat with a thoroughly trusted friend in lesser office. Pitt, however, often gave and often accepted small dinner parties, and took great pleasure in them. The testimony of his familiar friend, Lord Wellesley, which goes down to 1797, is most strong upon these points. 'In all places and at all times,' says Lord Wellesley, 'his constant delight was society. There he shone with a degree of calm and steady lustre which often astonished me more than his most splendid efforts in Parliament. His manners were perfectly plain; his wit was quick and ready. He was endowed, beyond any man of his time whom I knew, with a gay heart and a social spirit.'[1]

The habits of Pitt in Downing Street were very simple. He breakfasted every morning at nine, sometimes inviting to that meal any gentleman with whom he had to talk on business,[2] and it was seldom when the House of Commons met that he could find leisure for a ride.

When retired from office, and living in great part at Walmer Castle, Pitt, like Fox, reverted with much relish, although in a desultory manner, to his books. The Classics, Greek and Latin, seemed to be, as my father told me, Pitt's favourite reading at that period. Yet he was by no means indifferent to the literature of his own day. On this point let me cite a statesman who has passed away from us, to the grief of many friends, at the very time when the page which records his testimony has reached me from the press. Let me cite the Earl of Aberdeen, who once, as he told me, heard Pitt declare that he thought Burns's song, 'Scots, wha hae wi' Wallace bled' the noblest lyric in the language. Another time he also mentioned Paley to Lord Aberdeen in terms of high admiration, as one of our very best writers. Perhaps the great fault of his private life is that he never sought the society of the authors or the artists whom all the time he was admiring. Perhaps the great fault of his public life is that he never took any step—no, not even the smallest—to succour and befriend them.

With every drawback, however, and I have now named the most considerable, it certainly appears to me that Pitt was foremost among all the statesmen that England has ever seen. I will not pursue the invidious task of seeming to disparage other great men in contrast to one who was greater still; and the merits of Pitt himself will best appear as my narrative proceeds. But I shall think it the fault of that narrative if at its conclusion my readers should not be disposed to own that Pitt surpassed the Ministers who came before him, and has not been equalled by any of those who have since borne sway.

From this digression—I must own a very long one—I return to the Session of Parliament in 1785. It was opened on the 25th of January, by the King in person. His Majesty's Speech expressed congratulations on the improvement of the revenue, resulting from the measures of last Session. It invited the Houses to consider the further regulation of the public offices, and the final adjustment of the commercial intercourse with Ireland.

In another sentence the King's Speech took notice of 'differences on the Continent.' These were owing to the Emperor Joseph the Second. Since the year 1780 the death of Maria Theresa had left him sole chief of the Austrian Monarchy. Eager to emulate his still surviving neighbour, the great Frederick of Prussia, he plunged headlong into a career of active innovation. But it proved a contrast rather than a parallel. Frederick had made many changes, but none without full inquiry and careful thought. In general, therefore, the popular voice had been upon his side. On the contrary, it seemed to be the practice of Joseph the Second to act first, and inquire afterwards. So rash and heedless was his course, so little regard did he pay to long-rooted feelings, or to established rights, that at last the very nations which he desired to serve, from Transylvania to Flanders, rose almost in rebellion against his measures of reform.

As regards Flanders and Brabant, the first object of the Emperor had been by his own authority to release them from the obligations of the Barrier Treaty of 1715. He demolished all the fortifications except at Luxemburg, Ostend, and the citadels of Antwerp and Namur; and required the Dutch garrisons to withdraw from the Barrier towns. The full effect of these unwise measures was not apparent till ten years afterwards, when the French revolutionary army, having defeated the Austrian on the plain of Fleurus, overspread with perfect ease the open country, and annexed it to their own.

But further still, in no generous spirit, Joseph the Second desired to avail himself of the internal discords of the Dutch to wring from them whatever he desired. He claimed especially the possession of Maestricht and the free navigation of the Scheldt. In the spring of 1784 he surprised a fort which belonged to Holland, at the mouth of the river. In the autumn of that year he sent out two brigs with orders to resist the usual detention and examination in the Scheldt, and he announced that he should consider as a declaration of hostilities any insult offered to either of these ships. Nevertheless the Dutch officers quietly took possession of both. The Emperor, who was then in Hungary, immediately recalled his envoy from the Hague, and a war was supposed to be close at hand. But the measures of Joseph were as feebly prosecuted as they had been rashly commenced. He found the aid of France, upon which he had reckoned, altogether fail him; and thus after some negotiation and demur he was reduced in the autumn of 1785 to sign a treaty far from honourable to his arms, receding from most of the pretensions that he had put forward, and accepting in return a sum of money which the States of Holland consented to disburse, as the price of peace.[1]

In this Session the first business brought before the House of Commons was the Westminster Scrutiny. Nothing could have answered worse. All the resources of chicanery—resources well-nigh inexhaustible in our ancient law of Parliament—had been called forth on either side. Counsel were employed whenever a bad vote was to be struck off; and their speeches had been of the longest, especially whenever their arguments were slight or few. Thus in the eight months which had elapsed no effectual advance had been made; and it was computed that the process would require two years more. Under such circumstances the Scrutiny had grown hateful to both parties—quite as hateful to Sir Cecil Wray as it was to Mr. Fox. Still, however, a sense of consistency and a regard to the course he had formerly pursued induced Pitt to maintain it in the House of Commons. But he found the general feeling of hardship and injustice in this case prevail against him. A motion by Mr. Ellis, requiring the High Bailiff to make an immediate Return, was negatived by the decreasing majority of thirty-nine. On a second motion to the like effect by Colonel Fitzpatrick, the majority fell to only nine. Alderman Sawbridge then brought on a third motion in nearly the same words, which Pitt endeavoured to stave off by a proposal of adjournment; but he found himself in a minority of 124 against 162, and the original motion was carried without further hindrance. Next day, accordingly, the High Bailiff sent in the names of Lord Hood and Mr. Fox as highest on the poll; and thus was the great Whig statesman reinstated as Member for Westminster.

With this result the Westminster Scrutiny was certainly not a little damaging to the Prime Minister. In the first place there was the pain to see many of his friends vote against him—the mortification to find himself defeated in a House of Commons so zealous on his side. There was next the charge which, however unfounded, the Opposition did not fail to urge—of a vindictive rancour to his rival. But even the most impartial men might justly arraign him for a want of foresight and good judgment in his first preference of so faulty a tribunal.

On the other hand, Pitt was able to point with pride to the prosperous result of his financial schemes. He could show smuggling, for the time, almost annihilated, and the revenue in all its branches rising from its ruins; and he could promise for next year the creation of a Sinking Fund, to redeem the National Debt. But towards this end, and for the settlement of the remainder of the floating bills, the legacy of the last war, he required some new taxes, to produce at least 400,000*l.* a year. Accordingly, in his Budget, on the 9th of May, Pitt proposed an additional tax on male, and a new one on female, servants; and duties on retail shops, on post-horses, on gloves, on pawnbrokers' licences, and on salt carried coastwise.

On the Opposition side, the speakers—Fox especially, with Eden and Sheridan—attempted to denounce the Minister as both inaccurate in his statements and over sanguine in his hopes. Their general charges, flung out almost at random, made little impression on the public, but they were more successful in dealing with the details of the taxes proposed. The assessment on shops was open to some strong objections, which were strongly urged. The duty on maid-servants, besides several valid arguments against it, drew forth an infinite number of jests, not perhaps very diverting, and certainly not very decorous. Nevertheless the proposals of the Minister passed, though not without considerable modification; and after the experience of a few years the two most obnoxious taxes were repealed.

Besides these and other financial measures—as Bills for the regulation of the Navy Office, and for the better Auditing the public Accounts—Pitt brought before the House of Commons, in this Session, two subjects of paramount importance: first, the Reform of Parliament; and secondly, the commercial intercourse with Ireland.

On the question of Reform, Pitt had all through the winter been intent. He conferred at some length with the Rev. Christopher Wyvill, and other leaders of the cause. To them he renewed his promise of a measure of his own in the coming Session, adding, that to carry it, he would 'exert his whole power and credit, as a man and as a Minister.' Mr. Wyvill, without any authority asked or given, made known these expressions of Pitt in a circular letter to the Chairmen of the several Committees, dated December 27th, 1784; a step far from prudent, since it was not till some weeks afterwards that Pitt received the King's assent to the introduction of the measure, and His Majesty's promise to use no influence against it. 'I wish'—thus writes Pitt to the Duke of Rutland—'Mr. Wyvill had been a little more sparing of my name.' But he adds, 'Parliamentary Reform, I am still sure, after considering all you have stated, must sooner or later be carried in both countries. If it is well done, the sooner the better.'

Conscious of the difficulties of his task, more especially within the walls of Parliament, Pitt spared no exertion to gain it votes. He prevailed upon Dundas once more to give it his support. He wrote to Wilberforce, who was passing the winter with his family at Nice, entreating him to return for this special object. Wilberforce came accordingly, and as an intimate friend was a guest of Pitt in Downing Street, as he was also on many subsequent occasions. Next day but one after his arrival, his Diary has an entry as follows: 'Pitt's maid burnt my letters'—a dangerous mistake, as his biographers observe, to the young Representative of Yorkshire. The motion of Pitt for Parliamentary Reform was fixed for the 18th of April. Then, amidst a great throng of strangers, and to an attentive and expectant House, the Minister unfolded his scheme. In part it was prospective, and in part of present application. He proposed to disfranchise thirty-six decayed boroughs, each returning two Members, and by means of the seventy-two seats thus obtained to assign additional Representatives to the largest counties, and to the cities of London and Westminster. 'But in the counties,' added Pitt, 'there is no good reason why copyholders should not be admitted to the franchise as well as freeholders; and such an accession to the body of electors would give a fresh energy to Representation.' And in the boroughs he disclaimed all idea of compulsion. A fund of a million sterling was to be established to compensate in various degrees the several borough proprietors, and each borough should be invited to apply by petition from two-thirds of its electors.[1] Thus even in the case of burgage tenures, or of the very smallest hamlet, the franchise would not be forcibly resumed, but freely surrendered. Thus the extinction of the thirty-six small boroughs would be in a short time quietly effected. But as to the future, if any boroughs beyond these thirty-six either were, or grew to be, decayed and below a certain definite number of houses, such boroughs should have it in their power to surrender their franchise on an adequate consideration, and their right of sending Members to Parliament should be transferred from time to time to populous and flourishing towns.

Such was the general outline of Pitt's scheme, which he earnestly entreated the Members who heard him to consider, without suffering their minds to be disquieted with visionary terrors. 'Nothing,' he cried, 'is so hostile to improvement as the fear of being carried further than the principle on which a person sets out.' In the debate which ensued he had the pleasure to hear both Dundas and Wilberforce speak in favour of his Bill. Fox also, though finding an infinite number of faults with it in detail, expressed his support of the measure in its present stage. But, on the other hand, Lord North, in perfect consistency with his previous course, delivered an able and powerful speech not only against this scheme, but against all schemes of Parliamentary Reform; and on the division, at nearly four in the morning, the Minister had the mortification to find himself defeated by 248 votes, there being on his side only 174. Wilberforce, in his 'Diary,' says: 'Terribly disappointed and beat. Extremely fatigued. Spoke extremely ill, but was commended. Called at Pitt's; met poor Wyvill.'

Pitt considered the result as final for that Parliament at least. He saw that not even Ministerial power and earnest zeal, and that nothing but the pressure of the strongest popular feeling, such as did not then exist, could induce many Members to vote against their own tenure of Parliament, or in fact against themselves.

In Ireland it had been hoped that lasting peace and concord would have followed the full concession of legislative equality under the Rockingham administration; but, on the contrary, fresh grounds of agitation had almost immediately arisen, founded in part on the question of Parliamentary Reform, and in part on the claims of the National Volunteers. In 1783 we find Burke write as follows to his friend the Earl of Charlemont:—'I see with concern that there are some remains of ferment in Ireland, though I think we have poured in to assuage it nearly all the oil in our stores.' [1]

It had also been supposed, considering how signal and how recent were the services of Grattan, that he would for many years to come guide the feelings of his countrymen. Yet another man of great ability, Henry Flood, started up at once in open competition with him. In a few months Flood appears to have even shot above him in popular favour. Flood gained the ear of the Volunteers' Convention when they met in Dublin, and was deputed to bring forward the question of Parliamentary Reform in the Irish House of Commons, though Grattan was also one of its supporters.

In October, 1783, the contending orators gave battle to each other in the Irish House of Commons.

[1] Memoirs of Lord Charlemont, by Hardy, vol. ii. p. 100.

It was a memorable conflict, which General Burgoyne in his letters describes as far exceeding in violence anything that he had ever beheld in England. Then it was that Grattan in his speech described Flood as 'hovering about this dome like an ill-omened bird of night, with sepulchral note, cadaverous aspect, and a broken beak, watching to stoop and pounce upon its prey!' It is worthy of note that this last phrase of Grattan, 'a broken beak,' contained a peculiar sting as applied to a manifest defect in the face of his rival.

The Convention of the Volunteers at Dublin had likewise two contending leaders: first the Earl of Charlemont, and secondly the Earl of Bristol, who was also Bishop of Derry. This Prelate was son of the famous Lord Hervey in the days of George the Second, and a singular character, recalling the feudal Bishops of the Middle Ages. He proposed to the Volunteers that in the new Reform Bill which they were seeking to frame, the franchise should be granted to Roman Catholics. To this proposal Lord Charlemont gave his decided opposition, and by far the greater number of the delegates sided with Lord Charlemont. Accordingly Flood, as their spokesman, brought forward in the Irish House of Commons a measure of Reform for the benefit of Protestants only. He was defeated by a majority of more than three to one.

Such then was the state of Irish parties when in February, 1784, the new Lord Lieutenant, his Grace of Rutland, arrived at 'the Castle.' At nearly the same time Flood came back from England, whither he had gone to present at the King's Levee the Address voted by the Volunteers at the close of their Convention. But he had also another object. He had been returned to the English House of Commons also, through the influence of the Duke of Chandos, and he wished to try his powers—as he did with very indifferent success—in the debates upon Fox's India Bill. Many years later, after his untimely death in 1791, his rival in politics, made, in a noble spirit, some excuses for his failure. 'He misjudged,' said Grattan, 'when he transplanted himself to the English Parliament; he forgot that he was a tree of the forest, too old and too great to be transplanted at fifty.' Of this truth, which Grattan states in so solemn a strain, Grattan himself, at a still later period, was to be a far more conspicuous example.

Flood, on his return to Dublin in the spring of 1748, renewed with unabated spirit his motion on Irish Parliamentary Reform. Again it was negatived by overwhelming numbers.

The rejection of Flood's second motion gave rise, or at least gave pretext, to a serious tumult, when some noisy rioters broke into the House of Commons, and two of them were apprehended by the Serjeant-at-Arms. Yet ere long—especially considering the fixed resolve of continued exclusion to the Catholics—the question of Reform ceased to be uppermost in the public mind. There was a more pressing grievance in the growth, at this period, of great distress among the manufacturers and traders of the kingdom. Each of the numerous non-importation agreements, which had been taken up as a weapon against England towards the close of the last war, had now recoiled with violence upon its authors. So far they had only themselves to blame, but they also suffered severely from the high duties which, mainly at the instance of the manufacturers of England, had been imposed from early times on the commerce between the two countries, and which in 1779 were relaxed only in the smallest possible degree.

In April, 1784, the question of trade was brought before the Irish House of Commons by Mr. Gardiner, with perspicuity and candour; and several long debates ensued. Still, however, the distress increased. Through the summer many artisans who had been thrown out of employment came thronging into the great towns with violence, or threats of violence. One of their favourite devices, as derived from the early example of the insurgent colonies, was to tar and feather those whom they regarded as their enemies; and they were disposed to regard as their enemies all who dealt in imported goods. In the country districts, notwithstanding the earnest remonstrances of the Catholic as well as the Protestant clergy, the Whiteboys began to reappear. Other persons of higher station were willing to take part in any movement which they might hope to lead. In that point of view Parliamentary Reform, or commercial distress, or any other question, were exactly of equal moment. Such men subscribed an Address to all the Sheriffs of Ireland, calling upon them to summon meetings for the appointment of delegates to a new assembly which should be held in Dublin, and which, by another imitation of America, should bear the name of Congress. On this occasion Napper Tandy, the son of a Dublin ironmonger in large business—a name subsequently noted in the ranks of Irish faction—came forth for the first time. The Earl of Bristol was also active. With his Lordship at that time, as with his ally Sir Edward Newenham, hostility to the English connection appears to have been the leading principle. The former published a pamphlet so closely bordering upon treason that the Lord Lieutenant for some time seriously considered whether the Earl-Bishop should not be arrested and brought to trial. The question was referred to Mr. Pitt and his colleagues in England, and was by them decided in the negative.

On the 15th of August we find the Lord Lieutenant, in writing to Pitt, describe the state of things as follows:—'This city (of Dublin) is in a great measure under the dominion and tyranny of the mob. Persons are daily marked out for the operation of tarring and feathering; the magistrates neglect their duty; and none of the rioters—till to-day, when one man was seized in the fact—have been taken, while the corps of Volunteers in the neighbourhood seem as it were to countenance these outrages. In short, the state of Dublin calls loudly for an immediate and vigorous interposition of Government.'

In many other letters, public and private, did the Duke of Rutland consult his friend on the open violence which he saw, and on the secret conspiracy which he suspected. Nor did the Prime Minister leave him to deal singly with his difficulties. Neither then nor afterwards was any important step taken in Ireland without Pitt's advice and direction. Above all he now applied himself with earnest assiduity to the question most beset with obstacles in England—the question of the shackles and restrictions upon the trade of Ireland. That question was embarrassed by the resolute attachment to the existing system which prevailed at Manchester and our other manufacturing towns. There, at that period, the feeling in favour of high protective duties was quite as strong as in our own day we have seen it in favour of Free Trade.

Pitt well knew, and could not undervalue, the current of opinion in these vast centres, as they were rapidly becoming, of our manufacturing importance; but for his own part he was, as we have seen, a student and a disciple of the great work of Adam Smith. We find him, at the beginning of his deliberations on this subject (the 7th of October, 1784), write as follows, in strict confidence, to the Duke of Rutland:—'I own to you that the line to which my mind at present inclines is to give Ireland an almost unlimited communication of commercial advantages, if we can receive in return some security that her strength and riches will be our benefit, and that she will contribute from time to time in their increasing proportions to the common exigencies of the empire.'

To determine the details that might be requisite, or to weigh the objections that might arise, Pit summoned from Ireland two advisers of great knowledge and experience—Mr. John Foster, the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and Mr. John Beresford, the Chief Commissioner of the Revenue in that kingdom. With these gentlemen, and with Mr. Orde, the Irish Secretary, he held frequent conferences all through the autumn and mid-winter. There was no doubt that the Irish would gladly accept the commercial advantages, but the difficulty was how to render palatable to them any contribution in return. 'I really believe,' writes Pitt, 'that these objections may be removed; and I do not see the possibility of agreeing to complete the system of equal commerce (which is what must be now done) without some return being secured to this country. . . . I am ready at the same time to admit that the equivalent due from Ireland is not to be expected immediately. Give us only a certainty that if your extended commerce increases your revenue, the surplus, after defraying the same proportion of Irish expenses as at present, shall go to relieve us. This, I think, no Irishman can rationally object to; and Englishmen will be satisfied, though at present the equivalent will certainly be below the just proportion.'[1]

In January, 1785, the scheme framed by Pitt in concert with his colleagues, and embodied in Eleven Resolutions, was transmitted to Dublin Castle; but the Duke of Rutland and Mr. Orde, apprehensive of difficulties in their own Parliament, took it upon themselves to make one considerable alteration. They tacked a condition to the words stipulating for a Return from Ireland, so as to leave that Return, at least according to one construction, disputable and doubtful. This alteration was not known to the public; but when imparted to the Cabinet in England it caused much embarrassment to the Ministers, and drew forth two angry letters from the King.[2]

[1] To the Duke of Rutland, Dec. 4, 1784. On the full development of his plan see his able letter of Jan. 6, 1785, published at full length in the Quarterly Review, No. cxl., p. 300. As privately printed in 1842 it takes up eighteen octavo pages, and is the longest that I have seen of Mr. Pitt's.

[2] The King to Mr. Pitt, February 18 and 22, 1785.

The Eleven Resolutions, as submitted to the Irish Parliament, in their general outline are as follows :—First, to allow the importation of the produce or manufacture of other countries through Great Britain into Ireland, or through Ireland into Great Britain, without any increase of duty on that account. Secondly, in all cases where the duties on any article of the produce or manufacture of either country were different on importation into the other, to reduce them in the kingdom where they were the highest down to the lower scale. And thirdly, that whenever the gross hereditary revenue of Ireland should rise above 656,000*l.* in any year of peace (the actual gross income at that time being 652,000*l.*), the surplus should be appropriated towards the support of the naval force of the empire ; and since this hereditary revenue was in the main derived from duties of Customs and Excise, any augmentation in them year by year would, as Pitt contended, exactly measure the growth of the prosperity of Ireland, derived from striking off the shackles on her trade.

Such is the outline of the measure which, in the name of the Government, Mr. Orde laid before the Irish Legislature at the beginning of February, 1785. Through the House of Commons the Eleven Resolutions passed with no serious opposition, and through the House of Lords with none at all. When thus transmitted back to England, Pitt resolved, notwithstanding the reluctance of some around him, to proceed. He was still bent upon his final object ; and therefore, though not wholly adopting the Eleven Resolutions, he laid them before the English House of Commons on the 22nd of the same month. He moved only a general Resolution expressing the wish of the House for the final adjustment of the question, but he took the opportunity of explaining in detail the views which he had formed.

The speech of Pitt on this occasion may, even in its imperfect report, serve as a model of luminous statement in finance. Nor is it less conspicuous for its large and statesmanlike views of Irish policy. There were, he said, but two possible systems for countries placed in relation to each other like Britain and Ireland. The one of having the smaller completely subservient and subordinate to the greater—to make the one, as it were, an instrument of advantage, and to cause all her efforts to operate in favour and conduce merely to the interest of the other; this system we had tried in respect to Ireland. The other was a participation and community of benefits, and a system of equality and fairness which, without tending to aggrandize the one or depress the other, should seek the aggregate interest of the empire. Such a situation of commercial equality, in which there was to be a community of benefits, demanded also a community of burthens; and it was this situation in which he was anxious to place the two countries.

'Adopt then,' cried Pitt in his peroration, 'adopt that system of trade with Ireland that will have tended to enrich one part of the empire without impoverishing the other, while it gives strength to both; that like mercy, the favourite attribute of Heaven—

It is twice blessed,
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes.

Surely, after the heavy loss which our country has sustained from the recent severance of her dominions, there ought to be no object more impressed on the feelings of the House than to endeavour to preserve from further dismemberment and diminution—to unite and to connect—what yet remains of our reduced and shattered empire. . . . I ask pardon for the length at which I have spoken. Of all the objects of my political life, this is in my opinion the most important that I ever have engaged in; nor do I imagine I shall ever meet another that shall rouse every emotion of my heart in so strong a degree as does the present.'

To the views of Pitt a formidable opposition was at once announced. Fox, with his usual energy and eloquence, threw himself forward as the uncompromising adversary of Free Trade. Lord North espoused the same cause with less of vehemence, and also perhaps less eloquently, but certainly with far more of financial knowledge. And the further consideration of the subject was for some days adjourned.

The day but one after this debate we find Pitt write again to the Duke of Rutland: 'Be assured of our firm persuasion that you made no concession but what at the moment of the decision you thought necessary and conducive to the general object. You must at the same time allow for the absolute impossibility of our maintaining this system while so essential a part is left in any respect disputable. . . I think it perfectly possible, upon its being understood that everything depends upon it, that the Irish Parliament will give the necessary explanation without difficulty. All we ask of Ireland is to clear from doubt and uncertainty a principle which they must consider themselves as having assented to.'

But meanwhile in many parts of England a loud and angry cry arose. At Manchester and other great towns the manufacturers for the most part vehemently declared that they should be ruined and undone. In all haste they sent up to London the most stirring advocates and the most pathetic petitions. One of these, presented by Mr. Thomas Stanley, was signed by no less than eighty thousand manufacturers of Lancashire. 'It lies at my feet,' said Mr. Stanley, 'for it is too heavy to be held in my hands. After stating some other grievances, the framers of this great petition go on to say that the admission of Irish fustians and cottons into England was all that was wanting completely to annihilate the cotton trade of this country.'—We may smile perhaps to find them on this occasion employ exactly the same arguments which they or their successors afterwards denounced with so much indignation when applied to the Corn Laws, and coming from the lips of the landed gentlemen. Loaded as they were with heavy taxes, how could they possibly compete with the Irish in their own markets? What great advantages had Ireland in the low price of labour! From that single consideration how easy for her to undersell us!—No arguments but only time and the test of experience could solve such doubts beyond dispute.

Then again an alarm was raised that the measure would be destructive of our Navigation Laws, the main source (for so all parties then regarded them) of our maritime strength. Yet, as Pitt shewed, his proposal was fully in the spirit of those laws. Already, by their own express permission, goods the produce of any part of Europe might be imported into Britain through Ireland. All that was now contemplated was to extend the same licence to the settlements in America and Africa, for by the monopoly of the East India Company Asia would be still excluded.

As to the Colonies, however, it is to be borne in mind that according to the common and almost undisputed opinion of that time, Ireland had properly no part or share in them. Thus do we find Mr. Pitt write in confidence to the Duke of Rutland: 'Here, I think, it is universally allowed that however just the claim of Ireland is, not to have her own trade fettered and restricted, she can have no claim, beyond what we please to give her, in the trade of our Colonies. They belong (unless by favour or by compact we make it otherwise) exclusively to this country. The suffering Ireland to send anything to these Colonies, to bring anything directly from thence, is itself a favour, and is a deviation too, for the sake of favour to Ireland, from the general and almost uniform policy of all nations with regard to the trade of their Colonies.' Exactly similar to this was, I may observe, the old claim of the Crown of Castille as against the Crown of Aragon to the American Colonies. Hence the epitaph on the son of Columbus, which may still be seen in the cathedral of Seville:

A Castilla y a Leon Mundo Nuebo dio Colon.

Amidst all these entanglements the measure of Pitt made slow progress in the House of Commons. Two months were consumed in hearing counsel and examining witnesses, mingled with snatches of debate. Some of the principal manufacturers and merchants gave evidence expressive of their disapprobation and alarm. Many objections of minute detail were plausibly, and several justly, urged. On the whole Pitt found it necessary to admit modifications in order to maintain his majority—above all, since no hopes of a specific promise came to him from the Irish Parliament. He brought forward his amended proposals on the 12th of May. Thus in his Diary writes Wilberforce: 'May 12. House all night till eight o'clock in the morning. I differ from constituents. So affected that I could not get on. Pitt spoke wonderfully.'

The ultimate proposals of Pitt, as he now explained them, were found to be attended with numerous exceptions and additions. Thus from eleven the Resolutions had grown in number to twenty. They had come to deal with patents, the copyright in books, and the right of fishing upon the coasts of the British dominions. Further, they provided that all the Navigation Laws which were then, or which might hereafter be, in force in Great Britain should be enacted by the Legislature of Ireland; that Ireland should import no goods from the West Indies except the produce of our own Colonies; and that so long as the Charter of the East India Company existed, Ireland should be debarred from all trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope to the Streights of Magellan.

By such means, and such means only, could the majority of Pitt be maintained. 'Do not imagine'—thus he writes in strict confidence to the Duke of Rutland—'because we have had two triumphant divisions, that we have everything before us. We have an indefatigable enemy, sharpened by disappointment, watching and improving every opportunity. It has required infinite patience, management, and exertion to meet the clamour without doors, and to prevent it infecting our supporters in the House. Our majority, though a large one, is composed of men who think, or at least act so much for themselves, that we are hardly sure from day to day what impression they may receive. We have worked them up to carry us through this undertaking in its present shape, but we have had awkwardness enough already in many parts of the discussion.' This important communication is dated May 21, 1785. We may be well pleased that the Duke omitted to comply with the postscript: 'Be so good as to destroy this letter when you have read and considered it.'

Notwithstanding the jealous spirit which compelled these changes there remained enough of the first proposal to render it, as all parties have since owned, a boon of great value to the sister country. But in the very same proportion as it grew palatable to the English, it lost ground in the Irish House of Commons. Indeed during the last debates on this side of the Channel, and after the trials of party strength, Fox had entirely shifted his ground against the scheme. He had ceased to hope for its defeat in London, and he had begun to hope for its defeat in Dublin. With this view the measure was no longer in his eyes one of undue favour to Ireland; it was a signal breach of her newly granted legislative independence. 'I will not,' thus the great orator concluded, 'I will not barter English commerce for Irish slavery; that is not the price I would pay, nor is this the thing I would purchase.'[1]

Expressions of this kind found a ready echo across the Channel. When towards midsummer the Bill, as finally passed in England, came to Dublin, it was received with general disfavour. The Duke of Rutland and Mr. Orde found that they had most difficult cards to play. They had hoped for the aid of the leading patriot, the popular chief of 1782, who had supported the original Eleven Resolutions. But the changes made in them had wrought a corresponding change in him. 'I have seen Mr. Grattan,' writes the Lord Lieutenant on the 4th of July, 'but found him impracticable.' And again, on the 13th of August, when the measure was already before the Irish House of Commons: 'The speech of Mr. Grattan (last night) was, I understand, a display of the most beautiful eloquence perhaps ever heard, but it was seditious and inflammatory to a degree hardly credible.' Under such circumstances the result was soon apparent. Even on the mere preliminary motion that leave be given to bring in a Bill there was a fierce debate, continued till past nine in the morning, and 'the Castle' could prevail by a majority of no more than nineteen. A victory of this kind was a sure presage of defeat in its further stages. The Bill was in consequence relinquished by the Government, to the great joy of the people. For so great was then the jealousy of their new legislative powers as entirely for the moment to absorb all other thoughts of national advantage. In Dublin there was even a general illumination to celebrate the withdrawal of the Bill.[1]

Thus did Ireland lose a most favourable opening for commercial freedom. Yet on other points her prospects had brightened. The restoration of peace with foreign States, and the restoration also of order in the finances, had begun to draw prosperity in their train. The attempts in the winter of 1784 and again in the spring of 1785 to hold a Congress of delegates in Dublin had been encountered with firmness by the Government, and had signally failed. In like manner the hostile factions had found themselves unable, as they wished, to prolong the power of the Volunteers in time of peace, and to turn them into a standing weapon against the State. The Volunteers still continued to exist; they had still the Earl of Charlemont for General-in-chief, and by him were yearly reviewed; but their numbers rapidly dwindled, and they became the mere shadow of a shade. Meanwhile the Duke of Rutland, as Lord Lieutenant, was gaining great personal popularity. Young, of noble aspect, and of princely fortune, he was generous, frank, and amiable, as became the son of the gallant Granby. Fond of pleasure, he held a court of much magnificence; and the succession of various entertainments that he gave, splendid as they were in themselves, derived a further lustre from his Duchess, a daughter of the house of Beaufort, and one of the most beautiful women of her day. But besides and beyond his outward accomplishments, the confidential letters of the Duke to Pitt, all of which have been preserved, and some printed, show him to have possessed both ability and application in business. Perhaps had not his life so prematurely ended, his name might have deserved to stand as high in politics as does his father's in war.

To Pitt the failure of the Irish commercial measures was a deep disappointment, a bitter mortification. To them, to the framing or to the defence of their details, he had applied himself for almost a twelvemonth, and here was the result—the object of public good not attained, the jealousy of both nations stirred anew, and to himself for a time the decline of public favour, alike, though on exactly opposite grounds, in England and in Ireland. The journal of Wilberforce in the midst of the contest on this subject has this significant entry: 'Pitt does not make friends.'[1] On the other hand, Fox, as the champion of high protective duties, enjoyed in many quarters the gleam of returning popularity. Being at Knowsley in the course of that autumn on a visit to Lord Derby, the two friends went together to Manchester, and were warmly welcomed by the great metropolis of manufactures. Here is Fox's own account of it: 'Our reception at Manchester was the finest thing imaginable, and handsome in all respects. All the principal people came out to meet us, and attended us into the town with blue and buff cockades, and a procession as fine, and not unlike that upon my chairing in Westminster. We dined with one hundred and fifty people. . . . . The concourse of people to see us was immense, and I never saw more apparent unanimity than seemed to be in our favour.'[1]

During the Session of 1785 Pitt was able to make, as he trusted, a satisfactory arrangement with respect to the Four-and-a-half Fund. The frequent arrears and defalcations of payment in the Pensions that were charged upon it were certainly not more inconvenient to the holders than they were discreditable to the Government. We find Pitt write as follows on the subject:

Putney Heath, June 14, 1785.

My dear Mother,—From a thousand circumstances I have been even longer than I thought possible in executing my intention of writing. Latterly I have delayed it till I could have the satisfaction of giving you positive accounts on the interesting and long depending subject of the grant. I have infinite pleasure in being at length able to tell you that it is settled in a way which is perfectly unexceptionable, and will, I think, answer every purpose. A sum of 56,000*l.* was voted yesterday to make good the arrears of the 4½ per cent. up to the 5th of April last, and it was agreed to transfer the Duke of Gloucester's annuity of 9,000*l.* to the aggregate fund. Relieved from this, there can be no doubt that the produce of the fund will be adequate to the remaining charges. We may therefore fully depend on the discharge of the arrears very speedily, probably in the course of a few weeks, and on a punctual payment in future. Not a word of opposition was offered to the proposal. I cannot say how much I feel in a period being put to the embarrassment and inconvenience of a situation which ought to experience everything that is the contrary.

Our Session is cruelly protracted, to the disappointment of my hope of seeing you, which I had promised myself I should do before this time. How much longer it will last us is still uncertain, but I rather think we shall be at full liberty in less than a month. Our principal difficulties are surmounted, and the chief trial now is that of patience.

Believe me ever, &c., W. PITT.

The health of Lady Chatham had become in some degree impaired. She suffered at intervals from a painful disorder, and since 1783 did not repeat her visit to Hayes. Indeed so far as I can trace during a period of twenty years, she never again quitted Burton Pynsent even for a single night. Under such circumstances, her daughter, Lady Harriot, sometimes paid visits of several weeks either to Lord Chatham or to Mr. Pitt. There she was often in company with Mr. Edward Eliot, the early friend of her brother, and since the beginning of 1784 one of the Lords of the Treasury. An attachment sprang up between them, to the great satisfaction of their respective families. The offer of Mr. Eliot was accepted by Lady Harriot; and their marriage ensued

September 21st, 1785. A few days later Pitt wrote to his mother in these words:

Brighthelmstone, September 28, 1785.

I look forward to the happiness of being with you on Tuesday in next week, and am to meet the bride and bridegroom in my way at Salisbury. You will have heard from my sister since the union was completed, which I trust furnishes a just prospect of increasing happiness to both.

And here is the commencement of another letter after his return from Burton:

Downing Street, October 20, 1785.

Your letter found me exceedingly safe at Brighthelmstone, notwithstanding all the perils of thunder and lightning, which overtook me at Mr. Bankes's at the end of a long day's shooting, and were attended with no more consequences than a complete wetting. My conscience has reproached me a good deal for not having sent this certificate of myself sooner.

In the course of this autumn Pitt became possessor of a country seat. This was Holwood, or as he always spelled it, Hollwood. It lies in Kent, one or two miles beyond his birth-place of Hayes. The purchase of the property as it now exists was not made at once, but extended over several years, the first payment being November, 1785, and the last August, 1794; and the total sum paid by Mr. Pitt in all these years was nominally 8,950*l.* In fact, however, it was only 4,950*l.*, since in 1786 he raised 4,000*l.* as a mortgage on the land. Holwood was a small house, but in a beautiful country. The view from it extends over a varied and undulating plain, from the heights of Sydenham on the one side to the heights of Knockholt Beeches on the other. In the grounds are considerable remains of a Roman camp, in part overgrown by some fine trees. Holwood now belongs to a highly accomplished and amiable man, retired from office, who cherishes with care any memorial that may remain of Mr. Pitt. It is from him, Lord Cranworth, that I have received the particulars, as abstracted from his own title-deeds, of Mr. Pitt's purchases and mortgages. But a former proprietor has pulled down the house which the great Minister dwelt in, and has reared a suburban villa in its place.

In the winter Pitt was concerned to find that the arrangement which he had made of the Four-and-a-half Fund did not, as he hoped, avert all future embarrassment from Lady Chatham. Thus he writes:

Downing Street, December 1, 1785.

My dear Mother,—I have learnt with more concern than I can express the feelings of your mind on the subject of your last letter. My great consolation is that the circumstances you state will not, I trust, upon reflection, give ground to the serious anxiety which I am sorry to find it has occasioned to you at the moment. Though there may exist a present balance against you in Mr. Coutts's books, beyond what you had imagined, there are, I am sure, but too many reasons to prevent your having anything to reproach yourself with on that account; and the inconvenience will be, I flatter myself, of very short duration; or rather that the business may be so arranged as to prevent its producing any. As to the two thousand pounds you mention, I have only to entreat you not to suffer a moment's uneasiness on that account. I can arrange that with Mr. Coutts without difficulty, and without its coming across any convenience or pleasure of my own; though none I could have would be so great as to be able to spare you a moment of trouble or anxiety. If Mr. Coutts wishes any further security for the 700*l.* which you mention as due to him, it will also be very easy to settle that to his satisfaction. I do not precisely know whether there are any arrears or debts of any sort, independent of the balance to Mr. Coutts, which will prevent your income being free in future. But as the two quarters of the grant which are due will be probably paid very soon, and the fund is so fully equal to the charges upon it, I persuade myself that you will find in future ample means to carry on your establishment, at least on its present footing. I wish very much I could relieve you from any of the anxiety and fatigue of looking into all the points relative to the state of your affairs. If it will contribute at all to it, I am sure, from the forwardness in which public business fortunately is, I can command a few days between this and Christmas to come down to you for that purpose; and which, independent of that, I am exceedingly desirous of doing. In the meantime it will be a great satisfaction to me if you could let me know nearly the amount of any demands outstanding upon you. Indeed it is the only point I want for complete satisfaction; because, as to the sums due to Mr. Coutts, I assure you that they ought not to give you any sort of disquietude. I thought once of sending this letter by a messenger, but I considered that you would perhaps answer it less at your leisure and convenience than by the common post; and though I shall wish much to hear from you, I hope you will not take up your pen at any time that may be troublesome to you.

I am, my dear Mother, &c., W. Pitt.

At this period Mr. Pitt, wholly intent on public business, had much neglected his private affairs. Already had they fallen into some degree of embarrassment. In 1786 he requested his friend Mr. Robert Smith to examine them. Mr. Smith found that there was very great waste, and probably worse than waste, among the servants.[1] The evil might be checked for the moment; but through the ensuing years no effectual supervision was applied.

I now pass to matters of more public interest. But a few words on poetry before I come to prose.

It was not only by speeches or by essays, on the hustings or in the House, that the contest between Pitt and Fox was waged. Some of the political satires of that period attained a high degree of merit, and produced a powerful effect. But as to their effect there was a striking contrast between the early and latter part of Pitt's administration—a contrast that may be measured as between the Rolliad on the one side and the Anti- jacobin on the other. In the first period the superiority was beyond all doubt with the Opposition, in the second quite as clearly with the Minister.

The Rolliad—or to give the title more exactly, the 'Criticisms on the Rolliad'—came forth in parts during the last six months of 1784 and the first of 1785. It was first published in the 'Morning Herald,' a paper founded three years before. Other short pieces which soon afterwards appeared—the 'Political Eclogues,' and the 'Probationary Odes'—were combined with it to form a small volume, which has gone through a great number of editions, and which may still be read with pleasure. The principal writers were George Ellis and Tickell, Dr. Laurence, General Fitzpatrick, and Lord John Townshend.[1] At the outset Sheridan was suspected to be one of them, but in April, 1785, he took occasion in the House of Commons to deny the charge.

These gentlemen—the wits of Brooks's—being much disappointed at the results of the political conflict of 1784, gave some vent to their spleen in verse. For their subject they selected an imaginary epic, of which they gave fictitious extracts, and for their hero they took the Member for Devonshire, John Rolle. This gentleman, who became Lord Rolle in 1796, and who survived till 1842, was justly all through his life respected by his neighbours for hospitality and honour, for his consistent politics and his ample charities. But in 1784 he had provoked the Opposition by some taunts on the Westminster Scrutiny. He had besides been noticed as one of those impatient sitters who fretted at Burke's long speeches, and endeavoured to cough him down. The wits, in revenge, conferred upon him an epic immortality.

But in truth Mr. Rolle was little more to them than the peg on which they hung the shafts designed for higher game. They soon dismiss him with a few brief pleasantries upon his name or pedigree.

[1] On the authors of the Rolliad see some valuable contributions made in 1850 to the Notes and Queries by Lord Braybrooke, Mr. Markland, and Sir Walter C. Trevelyan (vol. ii. pp. 114, 242, and 373).

> Illustrious Rolle! oh, may thy honoured name
> Roll down distinguished on the rolls of fame!
> . . . .
> Hot rolls and butter break the Briton's fast,
> Thy speeches yield a more sublime repast!

With Mr. Pitt himself there was some difficulty in finding a good ground of attack upon his conduct. But then there was his age:

> A sight to make surrounding nations stare,
> A kingdom trusted to a schoolboy's care.

As regards his friends, the authors of the Rolliad by no means confined themselves to political attacks. They eagerly sought out any peculiarities of habit, or even of face. Thus, in allusion to his frugal table, they address the Duke of Richmond:

> Whether thou goest while summer heats prevail
> To enjoy the freshness of thy kitchen's gale,
> Where, unpolluted by luxurious heat,
> Its large expanse affords a cool retreat.

Or they refer, as follows, to the long chin of Lord Sydney:

> Oh! had by nature but propitious been
> His strength of genius to his length of chin,
> His mighty mind in some prodigious plan
> At once with ease had reached to Hindostan!

Or again as to the Marquis Graham, one of the Lords of the Treasury, who, in an unwary moment, had said in the House of Commons, 'If the Hon. gentleman calls my Hon. friend Goose, I suppose he will call me Gosling,' the Rolliad first in due precedence touches on the Duke. Then as to his son:

> His son, the heir-apparent of Montrose,
> Feels for his beak, and starts to find a nose!

However trifling the theme of the Rolliad and the Political Eclogues, it is always commended to us by a consummate mastery of the English heroic couplet. So graceful in that metre are their inversions, and so sonorous their cadences, and so uniformly are these merits sustained, that it suggests the idea of a single writer much more than of a confederated band of friends. And when, in addition to their metrical skill, their pleasantries were fresh and new, it can scarcely be doubted that they had political effect, and tended to assist the cause which they espoused.

Besides the authors of the Rolliad, Captain Morris attained at this time some reputation as a writer of songs. He was a boon companion of the wits at Brooks's; and he thought that abuse of their opponents gave new zest to his praises of love and wine. But in one or two places he has indulged in a savage strain such as no man of common feeling could approve. In 1784, for example, he wrote a ballad entitled 'Billy Pitt and the Farmer.' It tells, with some humour, a story how Pitt and Dundas missed their way one dark night near Wimbledon, and were fired at by mistake from a farm-house at Wandsworth. And here are some of the stanzas with which the gallant Captain concludes his tale.

Then Billy began for to make an oration,
As oft he had done to bamboozle the nation;
But Hodge cried 'Begone! or I'll crack thy young crown for't;
Thou belong'st to a rare gang of rogues, I'll be bound for't.'

Then Harry stepped up; but Hodge, shrewdly supposing
His part was to steal while the other was posing,
Let fly at poor Billy, and shot through his lac'd coat;
Oh, what pity it was it did not hit his waistcoat! [1]

At nearly the same time another political poet of much higher celebrity arose. This was John Wolcott, a native of Devonshire. He had taken Holy Orders, but had not the smallest inclination to clerical duty, and he subsisted mainly by his pen. Writing under the assumed name of Peter Pindar, he soon attracted notice by the humour of his grotesque descriptions, and still more perhaps by the audacity of his personal attacks. He loved especially to portray any respectable character in a ridiculous situation. Thus he represents the King, whom he spared less than any, as visiting a cottage near Windsor, and as struck with amazement at the sight of an apple-dumpling, not being able to discover any seam by which the apple was introduced! Thus he represents Sir Joseph Banks as boiling fifteen hundred fleas in a saucepan to ascertain if, when boiled, they might not turn scarlet like lobsters! And as to Mr. Pitt, the Reverend gentleman is never weary of taunting him with his too faithful observance of the seventh commandment.

The loss of the Irish Propositions was, as I have said, a most bitter disappointment to Pitt; but, as he writes to the Duke of Rutland, 'we have the satisfaction of having proposed a system which I believe will not be discredited even by its failure, and we must wait times and seasons for carrying it into effect. . . . All I have to say in the mean time is very short: let us meet what has happened, or whatever may happen, with the coolness and determination of persons who may be defeated, but cannot be disgraced, and who know that those who obstruct them are greater sufferers than themselves. . . . I believe the time will yet come when we shall see all our views realised in both countries, and for the advantage of both. . . . . . I write this as the first result of my feelings, and I write it to yourself alone.'

It was still the hope of Pitt to renew his plan with some modifications during the next year; but finding his friends in Ireland afford him little hope of a more successful issue, he relinquished the idea, and applied himself to carry out the same principles in another sphere. He was most anxious to lighten the shackles which at that period weighed down our trade with France, and during the autumn he planned a mission to Paris for that object. A little to his own surprise, perhaps, he found a ready agent in the foremost ranks of Opposition. William Eden came at this time to be detached from his party ties with Fox and North, mainly by the intervention of his personal friend John Beresford. So far as I am able to discover, he did not alter his politics on any public ground, nor, indeed, allege any such in his own defence. In his first letter to Pitt he expressed a wish to become Speaker of the House of Commons, if any opening should arise; but Pitt gave no encouragement to this idea, and early in 1786 sent over Mr. Eden as special envoy to Paris, under the Duke of Dorset as Ambassador, to negotiate a Treaty of Commerce with France. In that post his great ability and address were of signal service; but, as might be expected, his secession stung to the quick his former friends. There ensued some stanzas on 'the Loss of Eden' by the authors of the 'Rolliad,' and some taunts of no common asperity in the House of Commons.

Parliament met again on the 24th of January, and almost the first business of importance which engaged its time was a plan of the Duke of Richmond, as Master-General of the Ordnance, to fortify the Dockyards of Portsmouth and Plymouth. This plan had been already mooted in the House of Commons in the preceding year, but was then postponed. It was now brought forward by Mr. Pitt in the name of the Government. During the last war the unprotected state of our great naval arsenals had been painfully apparent. Nevertheless the scheme to fortify them was much opposed. In the first place, the Duke himself was not popular. Then there was the expense, estimated at 760,000*l*. Then again there was the constitutional jealousy of any new strongholds in England. Surely—so Sheridan in a most able speech contended —these unassailable fortresses might, in the hands of an ambitious and ill-advised King, be made the instruments for subverting the liberties of the people. Yet, as Pitt had already asked, in allusion to the system of Lord North, 'Is it less desirable for us to be defended by the walls of Portsmouth and Plymouth, garrisoned by our own Militia, than to purchase the protection of Hessian hirelings?' So far, however, did the eloquence of Sheridan, of Fox, and of Barré—for Barré also opposed the scheme—prevail in the House of Commons, that on the division the numbers were exactly equal: 169 on each side. The Speaker, Mr. Cornwall, gave his casting vote with the Noes, so that the entire project, to Pitt's great mortification, fell to the ground; nor was it ever afterwards renewed. 'After all,' so wrote Eden to John Beresford, 'it proves what I have said to you, that it is a very loose Parliament, and that Government has not a decisive hold of it upon any material question.' [1]

If, however, these failures both on Irish trade and on English fortifications be taken as evincing some decline in Pitt's popularity and influence, they were more than redeemed by the general applause which greeted his measure for the redemption of the National Debt. Last Session he had promised it for this; and all through the Recess, says Bishop Tomline, he received an almost incredible number of schemes and projects. Many of these came from amateur financiers in the country—the 'provincial Chancellors of the Exchequer,' as on one occasion they were termed by Sir Robert Peel—and such schemes might be quickly tossed aside; but others were of a different order, and required thought and care. Nor did Pitt neglect the published lucubrations of Dr. Richard Price. That remarkable man was then in the zenith of his fame. Though a Dissenting Minister of the Socinian school, and though well skilled in philosophical controversies, he had by no means confined his attention to them. He was an ardent champion of popular claims, and a profound adept in financial calculations. During the last war the American Congress had by Resolution expressed their desire to consider him a citizen of the United States, and to receive his assistance in regulating their finances—an offer which his advancing years induced him to decline.[1] So early as 1773 he had published an elaborate 'Appeal on the National Debt,' in which he strongly urged the importance of an inalienable Sinking Fund; and in 1786 he was able to assert that 'the plan which Mr. Pitt has adopted is that which I have been writing about and recommending for many years.'[2]

In this assertion, however, we must understand Dr. Price to mean the principle or leading idea rather than the means of execution; for Dr. Price himself, as also several of Pitt's later correspondents, had framed divers ingenious devices for converting low Stocks into high, as easier for future redemption, and as holding out, in theory at least, an ultimate advantage to the public. But on full consideration Pitt had become convinced that of all the modes of redemption, the simplest and the plainest—merely to take the Funds from time to time at the market price of the day—would be also the surest and the best.

Having laid a great variety of accounts before the House, and paved the way by the Report of a Select Committee, Pitt brought forward his proposal on the 29th of March. On this occasion Bishop Tomline has indulged us with some personal reminiscences which appear of great interest, and are among the very few that his 'Life' contains:—

'Mr. Pitt passed the morning of this day in providing the calculations which he had to state, and in examining the Resolutions which he had to move; and at last he said that he would go and take a short walk by himself, that he might arrange in his mind what he had to say in the House. He returned in a quarter of an hour, and told me he believed he was prepared. After dressing himself he ordered dinner to be sent up; and learning at that moment that his sister (who was then living in the house with him) and a lady with her were going to dine at the same early hour, he desired that their dinner might be sent up with his, and that they might dine together. He passed nearly an hour with these ladies, and several friends who called in their way to the House, talking with his usual liveliness and gaiety, as if having nothing upon his mind. He then went immediately to the House of Commons, and made this "elaborate and far-extended speech," as Mr. Fox called it, without one omission or error.'

The speech of Pitt on the 29th of March, though most imperfectly reported, was indeed conspicuous, even among his own, for its masterly expositions of finance. With some pride might he point to the re-establishment of the public credit and to the thriving state of the revenue under his administration. Already did the surplus of income and revenue nearly approach one million sterling; and this sum—namely, one clear million annually—whatever the future state of the Exchequer might be, Pitt proposed to place beyond the control of Government in the hands of Commissioners for the yearly redemption of the public debt. To this 'Sinking Fund' was also to be added the yearly amount of the interest of the sums to be redeemed, so that it was in fact a million at compound interest.

The establishment of a Sinking Fund was by no means new. It may be traced up, as I have shown in another work, to the year 1716; but until now the Fund which was created in peace might always, at the will of the Government, be resumed in war. Such was the course which the preceding Ministers had always pursued; such was the course which Fox acknowledged that he still preferred. Pitt, on the contrary—and this was the peculiar and distinguishing point in his system—proposed to make his Sinking Fund the creation of an Act of Parliament, and inalienable except by another Act of Parliament. His proposal being regarded as the surest bulwark of our national credit, was accepted with eagerness—nay, almost enthusiasm both by the House of Commons and the public. In vain did Fox, in several eloquent speeches, contend that our system should be to discharge in time of peace the debts contracted in time of war; and in the event of a new war to cease from paying off debts, and direct our entire resources against the foe. So strong was the current in Pitt's favour that Fox did not venture to call for a division.

In the Lords the main attack upon Pitt's measure, came from his own brother-in-law, Charles Lord Mahon, who in March of this year had succeeded his father as Earl Stanhope. During the contests of 1783 and 1784 he had been, as we have seen, among the most strenuous supporters of his kinsman; but there was in him, conjoined with great powers of mind, a certain waywardness of temper, which made him, it may almost be said, dislike the winning side as such. He loved better to act in a small minority; and in after years, as the disposition grew upon him, he loved best to act alone, coming in the House of Lords to be often surnamed, as in truth he sometimes was, the 'Minority of One.'

In May, 1786, Lord Stanhope having framed a plan of his own for the redemption of the National Debt, both published a pamphlet and delivered a speech against Pitt's. His main objection, however, was exactly the reverse of that which Fox had urged. He was not satisfied to secure the Sinking Fund by an Act of Parliament. He wished to carry its inalienability further still by certain changes of Stock and arrangements with the public creditor, so that any future diversion of the Sinking Fund would be equivalent to an act of national bankruptcy. Many compliments on his speech and pamphlet were paid him by Lord Loughborough, Lord Stormont, and other Opposition Peers, who already began to look upon him as their own; but they appear to have dissuaded a division, and none in fact took place.

Thus almost by general consent did Pitt's measure become law. During many years did it retain both the support of Government and the favour of the people. During many years did we continue to hold sacred a million sterling for the Sinking Fund, even when compelled, by the exigencies of war, to borrow that million sterling, and scores of millions sterling besides. But by degrees there came to be a doubt upon the public mind. The policy of a Sinking Fund, whenever propped up by loans, began to be greatly questioned; and the death-blow, it may be said, to the system of Pitt upon that subject was struck at last by a hand that had been most forward and active in assisting him to rear it. That hand was no other than Lord Grenville's. In 1786 he had been the Chairman of that Committee, as moved by Pitt, which immediately preceded the introduction of the Bill upon the Sinking Fund; and no man had been more zealous to promote or to vindicate the measure of his chief; but after the lapse of more than forty years it was found that experience and reflection had wrought an entire change in his views. A pamphlet published by him in 1828, and forming an era on this question, avows with noble frankness his sense of former error, and denounces with great force the inutility of a borrowed Sinking Fund.

It was under cover of the first great popularity of this measure that Pitt was able to propose and carry a vote of 210,000*l.* to discharge a new debt, which, in spite of the King's personal economy, had accrued upon the Civil List of 850,000*l.* a-year.

In this Session, as in those which followed, Pitt refrained from renewing his motion on Parliamentary Reform; but he gave his cordial aid to a Bill which had been framed and brought in by Lord Mahon for the improvement of County Elections. The object was in great part the same which has been since with general assent adopted—to provide an annual registration of the freeholders, and to admit several other polling-places besides the county town. Lord Mahon being called to the Upper House, Wilberforce undertook in his place, the further conduct of the Bill. By his exertions, and the support of the Prime Minister, the Bill passed, though not without some difficulty, through the House of Commons; but in the Lords it was thrown out, mainly—so Mr. Wyvill states—by a 'coalition of the King's Friends and the Whig aristocracy.'[1]

In this Session Pitt also achieved a considerable change in the Revenue Laws. 'I am just going,' thus he writes to the Duke of Rutland, April 29, 1786, 'to introduce a plan for excising wine, which, although it had nearly overthrown Sir Robert Walpole, will, I believe, meet with very little difficulty.' So accordingly it proved.

But perhaps the Session of 1786 is chiefly memorable for the first Parliamentary steps that were taken towards the Impeachment and the Trial of Warren Hastings.

The career of Hastings in the East and the divers grounds of charge that might be urged against him have been related at length by several writers, and by myself among the rest.[2] He left India at last in perfect peace, retiring from his post not as dismissed, nor even as rebuked, but of his own free will. In June, 1785, he once more set foot on English ground, there rejoining Mrs. Hastings—the fair Marian Imhoff of Germany

[2] I venture on this subject to refer the reader to the 68th and 69th chapters of my History of England. The private letters of Hastings, both at that period and after his return, will be found in the three volumes of the Biography by the Rev. G. R. Gleig.

—who had preceded him by about a year. His reception at home was highly favourable. The Directors of the East India Company greeted him with a public Address; the King and Queen were most gracious at the Levee. Her Majesty even condescended to accept from Mrs. Hastings the present of an ivory bed—a gift by no means forgotten in the satires of that day.

In the House of Commons Hastings had two most bitter enemies in Edmund Burke and Philip Francis; the one impelled by high public spirit, the other, we may assert, mainly by personal rancour. Only a few days after Hastings's arrival in London, Burke rose in his place and gave notice that if no other Member would undertake the business, he would himself on a future day make a motion respecting the conduct of a gentleman just returned from India. But the Opposition was at that time, as we have seen, wholly broken and enfeebled, and among the Ministers Hastings had many friends. He might regard as such—so greatly had circumstances changed—even his old antagonist Dundas, who had moved the Vote of Censure upon him in 1782. Hastings himself in his private correspondence observes as of Dundas in July, 1785, that 'the Board of Control has been more than polite to me.' Lord Thurlow went much further still. He espoused the interests of Hastings with a warmth which, considering his own post of Chancellor, may be justly condemned as indecorous. And some of his expressions on the subject deviated from truth even further than from decorum. 'The fact is,' he cried, 'that this is Hastings's administration, and that he put an end to the late Ministers as completely as if he had taken a pistol and shot them through the head, one after another!' Even in the previous year he had eagerly pressed Pitt for a peerage. Pitt, however, had preserved something more of a judicial mind. He owned the great merits and services of the late Governor-General, but alleged the Vote of Censure still standing upon record in the Journals of the House of Commons. 'Until,' he said, 'the sting of those Resolutions is done away by a Vote of Thanks, I do not see how I can with propriety advise His Majesty to confer an honour upon Mr. Hastings.'[1]

In this state of affairs, so far as Hastings was concerned, the members of the Opposition were little inclined to cheer on or to follow Burke. The inquiry which he had announced must of necessity be long and laborious, while the prospect of party advantage from it was extremely small. Had no fresh provocation arisen, the old quarrel would scarcely have been further pursued. Had Hastings remained quiet, there seems every reason to surmise that Burke would have, though reluctantly, remained quiet too.

But it was the misfortune of the late Governor-General to rely at this time on a most incompetent adviser. There was under his patronage a Major of the Bengal army, John Scott by name, whom the rupees of his patron had seated for the small borough of West Looe. In the House of Commons this gentleman avowed himself the agent and representative of Hastings. Zeal and industry were qualities possessed by Major Scott in the highest perfection; of judgment and discretion he was wholly destitute. He proved to be a most tedious speaker and a most injudicious friend. As to the last point, his private letters to Hastings are still on record, evincing his passionate and distorted views of public men and public measures. Thus in August, 1784, we find him vilifying his great opponent as 'that reptile Mr. Burke,' and with still more signal folly boasting that over the reptile he, Major Scott, had 'triumphed most completely!'

Acting on such notions as these, Major Scott rose in his place on the very first day of the Session of 1786. Reminding the House of the notice which Burke had given, he called upon Burke to bring forward his charges, and to fix the earliest possible day for their discussion. This unwise defiance received a prompt reply. It bound Burke to pursue his design, and it induced his friends to rally round him. Henceforward the zeal of Fox in this cause became fully equal to his own.

The first steps of the great twin leaders were motions for papers, which, being in part refused, gave rise to some keen debates. In these Pitt took occasion to declare his line—a line far different from Thurlow's. It was such as every Minister would profess at present, but such as hardly any Minister except himself appears at that time to have kept in view. 'For my part,' he said, 'I am neither a determined friend nor foe to Mr. Hastings, but I am resolved to support the principles of justice and equity. Mr. Hastings, notwithstanding all the assertions to the contrary, may be as innocent as the child unborn; but he is now under the eye and suspicion of Parliament, and his innocence or guilt must be proved by incontestable evidence.'

Early in April Burke, with the active aid of Francis, brought forward eleven specific Charges, which soon afterwards he increased, by successive accessions, to twenty-two. But by far the chief ones in importance were those on the Rohilla war, on Cheyte Sing, the Rajah of Benares, and on the two Begums or Princesses of Oude. On the other part Hastings sent in a petition praying to be heard in reply, and his petition being granted, he appeared at the Bar bending under the weight of a State paper which he had prepared, of immense length, according to the approved India Company fashion. He read on as long as his own strength and much longer than his hearers' patience endured. Then the Clerks at the Table supplied his place, and mumbled through the interminable document for some hours more, while the Members stole away one by one, comparing perhaps in their own minds the speeches of Scott with the essays of Hastings, and doubting whether,

The reading of this document at the Bar as at the Table took up not merely one day, but part of the next. Yet Hastings, looking no doubt to the great Bengal models, thought it much too short. 'Stinted as I was,' he says, 'and indeed most dreadfully, as to time'—so he writes to one of his friends May 20, 1786. Lord Macaulay has well shown in one of his excellent essays how total and complete was the misapprehension of Hastings on all points of the temper of the House of Commons.[1]

After the late Governor-General had concluded, Sir Robert Barker and other witnesses were examined at the Bar from time to time, and on the 1st of June Burke brought forward his first, the Rohilla Charge. He had with good judgment selected this as his vantage ground. The cruel attack on the Rohillas had been at one time condemned by the Court of Directors. It had been the ground of the Vote of Censure passed by the Houses. It had been in an especial manner the mark for the indignation and the invective of Dundas, who was now, beyond any other Member of Parliament, responsible for the conduct of Indian affairs. When, therefore, it was rumoured that Dundas intended to uphold Hastings on the very point as to which he had formerly arraigned him, the Opposition heard the news with exulting glee, and Fox turned it to the best account in one of his masterly speeches. Dundas, however, was at all times bold and 'cunning of fence.' And on this occasion he had specious arguments to urge. He declared that he still thought, as in 1781, that the attack on the Rohillas was a war of injustice. But he pointed out that he and the other members of the old Committee, the framers of the Vote of Censure—and to some of those in person he might still appeal—had in view not any penal prosecution of Hastings, but only his recall. That recall was the object which they had striven for and failed in. Subsequently to that period an Act of Parliament had been passed re-appointing Warren Hastings by name Governor-General of Bengal. The Statute therefore might be considered as a Parliamentary pardon, unless some fresh circumstances of aggravation had since occurred. Had there been any such? On the contrary there had been services of the most essential character during the latter periods of the war—services so great, Dundas continued, that we might almost be tempted to term Hastings the saviour of India. On these grounds, Dundas said, he must oppose the motion. Pitt, though he said nothing, had taken the same view. The Ministerial phalanx followed its chief, and upon a division Burke found himself defeated by 119 against 67.

Such a majority upon such a question might seem to the friends of Hastings the sure presage of approaching triumph. They expected that Fox and Burke would try perhaps one or two Charges more, would find the numbers to back them grown smaller still, and would then in anger fling down their brief and walk away. Had such proved to be the issue, Hastings would no doubt have ascribed it—so blind is human vanity!—to the transcendent merits of his essay at the Bar. Already in his private letters about this period does he declare that 'it instantly turned all minds to my own way.' Already does he speak of his demand to be heard in person as conceived 'in a happy hour and by a blessed inspiration.' But a complete reverse of fortune was now close at hand.

The great Benares Charge had been entrusted to Fox's care. He brought it forward on the 13th of June with his usual surpassing ability, resting his argument solely on this principle, that Cheyte Sing was an independent prince, no way liable to be called on for succour by the Bengal Government. 'I must acknowledge,' said he near his conclusion, 'that there was something like a colour for the vote to which we came respecting the Rohilla war. The extreme distance of the time at which it happened, the little information the House had of it till lately, the alleged important services of Mr. Hastings since that period (although I maintain that they were neither meritorious nor in truth services)—all these, with other causes and justifications, might then be urged. But there are none such on the present occasion. The facts are all of them undeniable; they are atrocious, and they are important; so much so that upon the vote of this night, in my judgment, the fate of Bengal depends.'

Fox was seconded by Francis, with far less ability indeed, but even superior bitterness. Then, after a short speech from Mr. Nicholls, tending to the complete innocence of Hastings, the Prime Minister rose. In the first place he utterly denied the independent position ascribed to Cheyte Sing by Fox. The Rajah of Benares was, as he contended, a vassal of the Bengal empire, bound in extraordinary perils to give extraordinary aid. For his contumacy in withholding such aid a fine might justly be inflicted. But then the question arose, what fine? Now to levy a fine of 500,000*l.* for the mere delay of paying a contribution of 50,000*l.*, which contribution had after all been paid, was to destroy all connection between the degrees of guilt and punishment—it was a proceeding shamefully exorbitant, and repugnant to reason and justice. On this ground, and this ground only, Pitt declared that after a long and laborious study of the question, he felt it his duty on the whole to vote for the Benares charge.

Until Pitt rose, and indeed for a long time afterwards, the House had been firmly persuaded that he intended to side with Hastings. Great, therefore, and general was the surprise at his conclusion. Several gentlemen in office, as Mr. Grenville and Lord Mulgrave, were already committed by their words or had already formed their opinions; and they declared themselves bound in conscience to vote against the motion. But the majority of the House was obedient to the voice of its leader. The Yeas for Fox's Resolution were 119, and the Noes but 79. Dundas had taken no part in the debate, but he voted with Pitt.

In a letter written more than thirty years afterwards, and only a few weeks before his death, we find Hastings revert to the proceedings of that memorable day. He declares that from information which he received at the time, Dundas had called on Pitt at an early hour of that morning, awoke him from his sleep, and engaged him in a discussion of three hours, the result of which was a total inversion of the Ministerial policy that night.[1] It is difficult to lay any great stress on the statements of that letter, since in the next sentence the writer goes on to say, 'I must stop, for my mind forsakes me.' Nevertheless it seems highly probable that the final decision upon the Benares charge may have been deferred till close upon Fox's motion, and may have been preceded by an anxious conference between the First Lord of the Treasury and the President of the Board of Control.

So general, however, had been the surprise at Pitt's conclusion, that all kinds of rumours and surmises were noised abroad in order to account for it. Most of these were low and base, as coming from the mere runners and lackeys of faction. Hastings might excite the jealousy of Dundas; Hastings might excite the jealousy of Pitt; he might become a formidable rival in the Cabinet; he might draw to himself the entire management of the Board of Control. Yet, though Dundas had many faults, mean jealousy was never one of them; still less can it be imputed to the lofty mind of Pitt. And, moreover, in this case the imputation almost answers itself; for how, in a Parliamentary Government, can any man—unless, perhaps, at a former period, some great Peer like Rockingham—aspire to fill any high office at home, or be the cause of jealousy lest he should fill it, without some degree of fluency at least in public speaking? Now of such fluency, Hastings, by his own confession, had none at all. Many years afterwards we find him write as follows to a younger friend:—'Your father knows that I am in a singular degree deficient in the powers of utterance.'[1]

But why in this case seek for any hidden or mysterious causes? Does not the true motive of Pitt lie clear upon the surface? Is it not to be found in the merits of the question itself? His full consideration of it had been long—perhaps too long—postponed; but when at length he went through the documents before him, they led him to exactly that conclusion which even now, on calm retrospect, we may be inclined to form. Hastings was right in regarding Cheyte Sing as a vassal, and in punishing his contumacy by the imposition of a fine; but Hastings was wrong—grievously wrong, and beyond all doubt misled by personal rancour and revenge—in the exorbitant amount of the fine imposed.

This conclusion as to the motive of the Ministers is confirmed by the unaffected language of Dundas to Lord Cornwallis, who only six weeks before—early in May, 1786—had sailed from England to fill the post of Governor-General of India. To him, in March, 1787, Dundas wrote as follows:—'The only unpleasant circumstance (in our public situation) is the impeachment of Mr. Hastings. . . . But the truth is, when we examined the various articles of Charges against him, with his defences, they were so strong, and the defences so perfectly unsupported, it was impossible not to concur; and some of the Charges will unquestionably go to the House of Lords.'[2]

In June, 1786, however, the Session was drawing to an end; and although Major Scott pleaded in the most vehement manner against all delay, the Charges against Hastings were of necessity postponed to the ensuing year.

On the 11th of July this busy Session was closed by the King in one of the shortest Speeches ever delivered from the Throne. Immediately afterwards we find Pitt returned to his favourite Holwood, but applying himself at once to fresh arrangements of business. Thence he writes:—

Holwood, July 13, 1786.

My dear Mother,—The pleasure I have received from your letter, which reached me at nearly the eve of our Prorogation, added, I assure you, not a little to the satisfaction of that welcome period. . . . I cannot indeed boast to be yet perfectly at leisure, but I have at least comparatively holiday, and shall, as I hope, be really in possession of them in a few weeks. . . . But I must be in town the very beginning of August, when our first payment of the Public Debt is to take place.

I am just now in the beginning of some very necessary arrangements to put the business of Government into a form that will admit of more regularity and despatch than has prevailed in some branches of it. The first step is in the appointment of a new Committee of Trade, which becomes every day more and more important, at which Mr. Jenkinson is to preside, with the honour of a Peerage. This, I think, will sound a little strange at a distance, and with a reference to former ideas; but he has really fairly earned it and attained it at my hands.

The reconstruction of the Board of Trade, which the Economical Bill of Burke had swept away, was almost a necessity in a commercial country, and in view of the commercial changes which Pitt designed. We have seen that Mr. Jenkinson, now raised to the Peerage as Lord Hawkesbury, was the President of the new Board, while for its Vice-President Pitt named William Grenville.

The Peerage of Lord Hawkesbury was followed by several more. Thus, Sir Guy Carleton became Lord Dorchester, and Sir Harbord Harbord Lord Suffield; and English Baronies were granted to the Irish Earls of Shannon and Tyrone. Earlier in the year Pitt also obtained from the King two promotions in the Peerage on strong grounds of merit: the advancement of Lord Camden to be an Earl and Viscount Bayham; and the advancement of Earl Gower to be Marquis of Stafford. Yet the Minister was anxious at this time to stand firm against most new claims. On the 19th of July he writes as follows to the Duke of Rutland: 'I have no difficulty in stating fairly to you that a variety of circumstances has unavoidably led me to recommend a larger addition to the British Peerage than I like or than I think quite creditable; and I am on that account very desirous not to increase it now farther than is absolutely necessary.'

In the Session which was just concluded, Pitt had been able to strengthen himself in the House of Commons. He was still the only Cabinet Minister in that assembly; but there were two young men of high promise, one of whom he had just promoted, and the other just placed in office. These were the new Vice-President of the Board of Trade, William Grenville, afterwards Lord Grenville, and the new Lord of the Treasury, Richard Wesley, Earl of Mornington in the Irish Peerage, afterwards Marquis Wellesley. It was some time, however, ere Pitt obtained from them much assistance in debate. The oratorical eminence of both was a plant of later growth.

Writing to the Duke of Rutland in October, 1785, Pitt had thrown out the idea of Grenville for Irish Secretary in the place of Orde. He added: 'I do not know that he would take it, and rather suppose that he would not. I think, too, that his near connection with Lord Buckingham is itself, perhaps, a sufficient objection; though in temper and disposition he is much the reverse of his brother, and in good sense and habits of business very fit for such a situation.' Grenville had also taken part in several important debates, always with authority, and sometimes with success. But he did not, according to the common phrase, 'make way' in the House of Commons. To his style of speaking the House of Lords was certainly the appropriate sphere, and to this it appears that so early as 1786 Grenville in his secret hopes aspired.[1]

Lord Mornington at the Treasury did not for a long time do justice to himself. Some years elapsed before he spoke at much length or with much effect. Even after he had made manifest his great oratorical powers, it required much persuasion of others and much preparation of his own before he would engage to take part in a debate. Pitt once said of him that he was the animal of the longest gestation he had ever seen. His speeches, when at last they came, were excellent and justly admired, above all for their classic taste, their graceful elocution, and their vivid style.

The main reliance of Pitt in all debates was still, therefore, that able and zealous friend who had stood by him ever since his outset in official life. Henry Dundas, sprung from a family most eminent in Scottish jurisprudence, was the son of one President of the Court of Session, the brother of a second, and the uncle of a Lord Chief Baron. Born in 1742, and sent to Parliament in 1774 by his native county of Edinburgh, his outset in public life among 'the Southron' might be compared to Wedderburn's, twelve years before. But there was all the difference between a very cold heart and a very warm one. Wedderburn, with no predilections except for his own rise, took the utmost pains, and with success, to divest himself of the Scottish dialect and accent. Dundas, on the contrary, in a far more manly spirit, as he clung to all other kindred ties, retained the speech and the tones of his fatherland. Intent only on the matter, to which he applied his masculine good sense, he never seemed to care for or to hesitate in the choice of words. Thus the graces of elocution and delivery were perhaps despised, or certainly at least neglected, by him. Throwing himself boldly into the van of the Parliamentary conflict, he would grapple at once with the strength of the arguments before him, and strike home at their vulnerable points. His adversaries might now and then indulge a smile at some provincial phrase or uncouth gesticulation, but they had often to quail before the close pressure of his logic and the keen edge of his invectives. They quickly found that it was difficult to answer, and impossible to daunt him. In business, as in public speaking, his turn of mind was eminently practical, clear, and to the point. Frank and cordial in his temper, fond of jests and good fellowship in private life, convivial to the full extent admitted by the far from abstemious habits of his age, he was much beloved in the circle of his friends, nor always disliked even by his political opponents. Besides that his temper was to everyone generous and kindly, his heart warmed to a fellow-countryman as such. I have heard a Scottish Peer of the opposite party, but a discerning and long-experienced man—the second Earl of Minto—say that, as he believed, there was scarce a gentleman's family in Scotland, of whatever politics, which had not at some time and in some one of its members received some Indian appointment or other act of, in many cases quite disinterested, kindness from Henry Dundas.

In the House of Lords, the venerable Camden was enfeebled by the weight of advancing years. Lord Thurlow was most powerful and ready, but in an equal degree wayward and impracticable. Lord Carmarthen, at this time Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, brought to the Government more of polish than weight. After Wilberforce had one day in 1785 dined with Pitt, we find him in his Diary contrast 'pompous Thurlow and elegant Carmarthen.' And at the same period the new American Minister, John Adams, writes: 'The Marquis of Carmarthen is a modest, amiable man; treats all men with civility, and is much esteemed by the Foreign Ministers, as well as the nation, but is not an enterprising Minister.' [1]

Such was the general state of the Ministry at the close of the Session of 1785, and for a long time afterwards.

In August of this year died Frederick the Second, or the Great, King of Prussia. With all his faults, and they were many, he towered high above all the princes of his time in genius and renown; and in his reign of forty-five years he had doubled the extent, and much more than doubled the wealth and resources, of his kingdom. His nephew and successor, under the name of Frederick William the Second, was cast in a different mould. Pleasure, not ambition, was the ruling object of his life. As Sir James Harris in the same year aptly writes: 'The late King had Solomon's wisdom; this King seems disposed to have only his concubines.'

[1] To Secretary Jay, November 4, 1785; Adams's Works, vol. viii. p. 336.

In the same month the life of George the Third was exposed to some danger. As His Majesty was one day stepping from his coach at St. James's Palace, he saw a woman of respectable appearance hold forth a paper to him, and as he extended his arm to receive it, she made a thrust at him with a knife which she held in her other hand. Starting back, the King escaped the blow, while the woman was at once seized and secured. But the King's first thought, greatly to his honour, was to protect her from any hasty violence. 'I am not hurt,' he said: 'take care of the poor woman; do not hurt her.' She was in due course examined before the Privy Council, when it appeared that her name was Margaret Nicholson, a single woman, who gained her living by needle-work. No less apparent were the insane delusions to which she had been lately liable; one above all, that she was entitled as of right to the Crown of England. On a medical certificate to that effect she was removed to Bethlehem Hospital, where, without any recovery of her reason, she survived almost forty years.

A grievous family affliction was at this time sustained by Mr. Pitt. Mr. and Lady Harriot Eliot had settled in town during August on account of her expected confinement; and on the 20th of September Pitt could announce to his mother the prosperous event:

'I have infinite joy in being able to tell you that my sister has just made us a present of a girl, and that both she and our new guest are as well as possible.'

But, unhappily, these prosperous symptoms did not long continue. Causes of alarm arose: she grew weaker and weaker; and on the 25th no hope of her life was left. Then Pitt wrote as follows to Mrs. Stapleton, his mother's companion and friend:

Downing Street,
Sunday, September 25, 1786,
11 o'clock.

Dear Madam,—In a most afflicting moment it is some consolation to me to have recourse to your kind and affectionate attention to my mother, which she has so often experienced. The disorder under which my poor sister has suffered since Friday morning appears, I am grieved to say, to have taken so deep a root, that all the efforts of medicine have served only in some degree to abate it, but without removing the cause. This circumstance and the loss of strength render her case now so alarming, that although hope is not entirely extinguished, I cannot help very much fearing the worst; and unless some very favourable change takes place, there is too much reason to believe the event may be soon decided. In this distressful situation I scarce know what is best for my mother—whether to rely for the present on the faint chance there is of amendment, or to break the circumstances to her now, to diminish if possible the shock which we apprehend. I have on this account addressed myself to you, that, knowing what is the real state of the case, you may judge on the spot whether to communicate any part of it immediately or to wait till the moment of absolute necessity. I need make no apology for committing to you, my dear Madam, this melancholy task. You will make, I am sure, every allowance for the feelings under which I write.

Sincerely and affectionately yours, W. PITT.

Since writing this the symptoms are become decided; and though the sad event has not actually taken place, it is inevitable. My brother is probably at Burton, but I will send to Weymouth. I trust all to your goodness and attention.

Lady Harriot died the same day, the 25th of September. Bishop Tomline—then still Dr. Pretyman—tells us in his Biography: 'It was my melancholy office to attend this very superior and truly excellent woman in her last moments; and afterwards to soothe, as far as I was able, the sufferings of her afflicted husband and brother—sufferings which I shall not attempt to describe. It was long before Mr. Pitt could see any one but myself, or transact any business except through me. From this moment Mr. Eliot took up his residence in Mr. Pitt's house, and they continued to live like brothers. But Mr. Eliot never recovered his former cheerfulness and spirits, nor could he bring himself again to mix in general society. He passed great part of his time in my family, both in town and country, and seemed to have a peculiar satisfaction in conversing unreservedly upon the subject of his loss with Mrs. Pretyman, who had been the intimate friend of his lamented wife and deeply shared in his affliction.'

The letters of Pitt to his mother at this period are, as might be expected, full of affectionate sympathy. On the 4th of October, the morning after the funeral, he set out to join her at Burton Pynsent, and early in November renewed his visit to that place.

In the interval between these visits he writes to his mother from Downing Street, October 27: 'Tuesday or Wednesday next is fixed for christening the poor child; and as the weather is favourable, Eliot hopes in a very few days afterwards to begin his journey westward and bring her to you.' At the request both of Mr. Eliot and Mr. Pitt, Mrs. Pretyman became her godmother, with the Dowager Lady Chatham. She received her mother's name of Harriot, and was brought up by her father so long as he survived, and subsequently by her grandmother at Burton Pynsent. In 1806 she married Colonel, afterwards Lieutenant-General Sir William Pringle, by whom she had one son and four daughters; and she died in 1842.

Ever since the beginning of the year Pitt had been anxiously intent on the conclusion of the treaty which was negotiating at Paris. Mr. Eden had written to him by almost every post, and consulted him on almost every step. There had been great difficulties and great delays, and Mr. Eden had found the energy of the Prime Minister combining with his own to overcome them. At length, the articles being adjusted, the Treaty of Commerce was signed by Mr. Eden and M. de Rayneval on the 26th of September—the very day after Lady Harriot's death. Under such mournful auspices did the long wished-for tidings arrive. Another proof of the sad truth which the French moralist long since expressed, that in this world joyful events scarce ever come to us at the time when they would give us most joy.

The great object of Pitt in negotiating this treaty was to put an end, as far as possible, to prohibitions and prohibitory duties. He did not seek to reduce or endanger the revenue by abolishing the custom duties altogether. On the contrary, he expected to benefit the revenue from that source by imposing only moderate duties, which would really be levied on all articles imported, and which would deal almost a death-blow on the contraband trade. For in spite of Pitt's previous measures, the contraband trade in several of its branches continued to prevail. Take the instances of brandy and of cambrics. Only six hundred thousand gallons of French brandy were legally imported in a year, while no less than four millions of gallons were believed to be every year smuggled into England.[1] And since there was a total prohibition of French cambrics, every yard of them sold in England must have come in by illicit means. 'I am obliged to confess,' said Pitt, in the House of Commons, 'that increase of revenue by means of reduction of duties once was thought a paradox; but experience has now convinced us that it is more than practicable.'

The Treaty of Commerce with France, as signed by Mr. Eden, was to continue in force twelve years. It stipulated that the subjects of the two contracting parties might import, in their own vessels, into the European dominions of each other every kind of merchandise not especially prohibited. They and their families might reside, either as lodgers or as householders, free from any restraint in matters of religion, and from any impost under the name of head-money or argent du chef; free also to travel through the country, or depart from it, without licences or passports. The wines of France were to be admitted into England at no higher duties than those of Portugal, and the duties on French vinegar, brandy, and oil of olives were also much reduced.

The amount of duty, in both nations, on hardware, cutlery, and a great variety of other articles, was in like manner determined by this treaty; mostly at very moderate rates, not exceeding twelve or fifteen per cent. And in case of either nation being engaged in war, the right of interference of the other party by equipping privateers, or by other means, was expressly provided against and renounced.

We find Pitt during his second visit to his mother resume his correspondence on business, and write an important letter to the Duke of Rutland.

My dear Duke, ...
I have thought very much since I received your letter respecting the general state of Ireland, on the subjects suggested in that and your official letters to Lord Sydney. The question which arises is a nice and difficult one. On the one hand, the discontent seems general and rooted, and both that circumstance, and most of the accounts I hear, seem to indicate that there is some real grievance at bottom, which must be removed before any durable tranquillity can be secured. On the other hand, it is certainly a delicate thing to meddle with the Church Establishment in the present situation of Ireland; and anything like concession to the dangerous spirit which has shown itself is not without objection. But on the whole, being persuaded that Government ought not to be afraid of incurring the imputation of weakness by yielding in reasonable points, and can never make its stand effectually till it gets upon right ground, I think the great object ought to be, to ascertain fairly the true causes of complaint, to hold out a sincere disposition to give just redress, and a firm determination to do no more, taking care in the interval to hold up vigorously the execution of the law as it stands (till altered by Parliament), and to punish severely (if the means can be found) any tumultuous attempt to violate it. I certainly think the institution of tithe, especially if rigorously enforced, is everywhere a great obstacle to the improvement and prosperity of any country. Many circumstances in practice have made it less so here; but even here it is felt; and there are a variety of causes to make it sit much heavier on Ireland. I believe, too, that it is as much for the real interest of the Church as for the land to adopt, if practicable, some other mode of provision. If from any cause the Church falls into general odium, Government will be more likely to risk its own interests than to serve those of the Church by any efforts in its favour. If, therefore, those who are at the head of the clergy will look at it soberly and dispassionately, they will see how incumbent it is upon them, in every point of view, to propose some temperate accommodation; and even the appearance of con cession which might be awkward in Government, could not be unbecoming if it originated with them. The thing to be arrived at, therefore, seems, as far as I can judge of it, to find out a way of removing the grievances arising out of a tithe, or, perhaps, to substitute some new provision in lieu of it; to have such a plan cautiously digested (which may require much time), and, above all, to make the Church itself the quarter to bring forward whatever is proposed. How far this is practicable must depend upon many circumstances, of which you can form a nearer and better judgment, particularly on the temper of the leading men among the clergy. I apprehend you may have a good deal of difficulty with the Archbishop of Cashel;[1] the Primate[2] is, I imagine, a man to listen to temperate advice: but it is surely desirable that you should have as speedily as possible a full communication with both of them; and if you feel the subject in the same light that I do, that, while you state to them the full determination of Government to give them all just and honourable support, you should impress them seriously with the apprehension of their risking everything if they do not in time abandon ground that is ultimately untenable. To suggest the precise plan of commutation which might be adopted is more than I am equal to, and is premature; but, in general, I have never seen any good reason why a fair valuation should not be made of the present amount of every living, and a rent in corn to that amount be raised by a pound rate on the several tenements in the parish, nearly according to the proportion in which they now contribute to tithe. When I say a rent in corn, I do not actually mean paid in corn, but a rent in money regulated by the average value, from time to time, of whatever number of bushels is at present equal to the fair value of the living. This would effectually prevent the Church from suffering by the fluctuations in the value of money, and it is a mode which was adopted in all college leases, in consequence, I believe, of an Act of Parliament in the time of Queen Elizabeth. I need not say that I throw out these ideas in personal confidence to yourself; and I shall wish much to know what you think of them, and whether you can make anything of your prelates, before any measure is officially suggested. It seems material that there should be the utmost secrecy till our line is decided upon, and it must be decided upon completely before Parliament meets. Yours faithfully and sincerely, W. PITT.

It cannot fail, I think, to strike the reader how many ideas of Mr. Pitt, which in his own day were dissuaded or opposed by others as dangerous, have since come to be adopted almost by universal assent as indispensable.

Downing Street, Nov. 13, 1786.

My dear Mother, ... Having been all the morning in the Court of Exchequer, I have not yet seen my brother; but Eliot and I are both going to dine there: which I am very glad to do on many accounts, and I reckon it as a step gained for Eliot. I flatter myself he has even made some progress in these two days, and I dare say will, in a little while, more and more. To-morrow I hope to get to Holwood, where I am impatient to look at my works. I must carry there, however, only my passion for planting, and leave that of cutting entirely to Burton.

Holwood, Nov. 18, 1786.

My works are going on very prosperously, and furnish a great deal of very pleasant employment, which just at present I have more leisure for than usual. I expect, however, Mr. Eden to arrive in a day or two, with abundance of details relative to the Treaty, which will break in a little upon planting. All, however, is going on as easily as possible, and I flatter myself with the hopes of seeing everything in good train for the Session by Christmas, which I am eager to accomplish for more reasons than one. Mrs. Stapleton's friend Lord Mansfield is supposed to be certainly resigning at length, and will probably not long survive his business.

Where Mr. Pitt says in one of these letters that he must not carry his 'passion for cutting' to Holwood, he did not answer for the future. Three seasons later I find an entry as follows in the Diary of Mr. Wilberforce, who was visiting his friend at Holwood: 'April 7th, 1790. Walked about after breakfast with Pitt and Grenville. We sallied forth armed with bill-hooks, cutting new walks from one large tree to another, through the thickets of the Holwood copses.'

Besides the points that were settled in the Treaty of Commerce, there were some others reserved for a subsequent Convention; and to this new negotiation Mr. Eden applied himself with indefatigable industry, assisted as before by the zealous exertions of Pitt. At length, on the 15th of January, 1787, the Convention was signed at Versailles, between Mr. Eden and the Comte de Vergennes, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs.

In January there was also concluded an Ecclesiastical appointment which Pitt had eagerly wished. The Bishop of Durham having died, it was intended to translate to that rich See Dr. Thomas Thurlow, who was already Bishop of Lincoln and Dean of St. Paul's. Pitt was most desirous that Dr. Pretyman should succeed Dr. Thurlow in both these offices. The draft of his letter to the King upon this subject is one of the very few preserved among his papers. It is dated the day before the meeting of Parliament. We find him press strongly for the King's consent, and assure His Majesty that there is 'nothing which Mr. Pitt has more anxiously and personally at heart.' His Majesty, though with strongly expressed reluctance, complied with this double request, and thus did Dr. Pretyman, according to the bad custom of those times, become both Bishop and Dean.

Parliament met again on the 23rd of January. The King's Speech announced the conclusion of the Treaty of Commerce, 'and I trust you will find,' His Majesty added, 'that the provisions contained in it are calculated for the encouragement of industry, and the extension of lawful commerce in both countries.' The provisions contained in it were still unknown to the public. Yet no sooner had the Address been moved and seconded than Fox sprang to his feet to denounce in vehement terms the idea of any concert or alliance with the French. In his own account of this evening he says, 'There was no more debate and no division, so that I was time enough to go to dinner at Derby's, where everybody seemed to think I had done right.' [1]

This was only a skirmish. But soon after the Treaty had been laid upon the table a battle in due form began. It may be of interest on this occasion to contrast the language as to France used by the two great party leaders.

Mr. Pitt said, 'Considering the Treaty in its political view, I shall not hesitate to contend against the too frequently expressed opinion that France is and must be the unalterable enemy of England. My mind revolts from this position as monstrous and impossible. To suppose that any nation can be unalterably the enemy of another is weak and childish.'

[1] Fox Memorials, vol. ii. p. 276.

On the other hand Mr. Fox said, 'Undoubtedly I will not go the length of asserting that France is and must remain the unalterable enemy of England, and that she might not secretly feel a wish to act amicably with respect to this kingdom. It is possible, but it is scarcely probable. That she, however, feels in that manner at present I not only doubt, but disbelieve. France is the natural political enemy of Great Britain. . . . . I say again I contend that France is the natural foe of Great Britain, and that she wishes, by entering into a commercial treaty with us to tie our hands, and prevent us from engaging in any alliance with other Powers.'

With passages such as these, and there are many more such upon record, it will be seen how just and well deserved is the rebuke which Lord Macaulay gives to some of the foreign accounts of Mr. Pitt. 'Those French writers who have represented him as a Hannibal, sworn in childhood by his father to bear eternal hatred to France, and as having been the real author of the Coalition, know nothing of his character or history.' On the contrary, as Lord Macaulay goes on to state, 'Pitt was told in the House of Commons that he was a degenerate son, and that his partiality for the hereditary foes of our island was enough to make his great father's bones stir under the pavement of the Abbey.'

Of the taunts which Lord Macaulay has thus commemorated, some of the most bitter came at this time from Philip Francis. It might seem as if the author of 'Junius' stood half revealed before us by the similar scope of his reflections, and the innate vigour of his style: 'Nations which border on each other never can agree; for this single reason, because they are neighbours. All history and experience assure us of the fact. As long as the Scotch and English stood in the relation of neighbours to each other, how was it possible they should agree? That cause of opposition ceased at their union, and instead of mortal enemies I trust in God they are immortal friends. . . . . But now it seems we are arrived at a new enlightened era of affection for our neighbours, and of liberality to our enemies, of which our uninstructed ancestors had no conception. The pomp of modern eloquence is employed to blast even the triumphs of Lord Chatham's administration. The polemic laurels of the father must yield to the pacific myrtles which shadow the forehead of the son. Sir, the glory of Lord Chatham is founded on the resistance he made to the united power of the House of Bourbon. The present Minister has taken the opposite road to fame; and France, the object of every hostile principle in the policy of Lord Chatham, is the gens amicissima of his son.'

Besides these veteran characters, if I may so term them, a new actor at this time appeared upon the scene. This was Mr. Charles Grey, known subsequently as Lord Howick, and then as the second Earl Grey. Born in 1764, he had come in for Northumberland in June, 1786, upon an accidental vacancy. From his outset he warmly attached himself to the politics of Fox, and he delivered his first speech in opposition to the Treaty with France. Then were heard the first accents of that most lofty and thrilling and as it were most thorough-bred eloquence, which was not extinguished, and scarcely even dimmed, after an interval of fifty years.

As to the outset of Mr. Grey in the House of Commons, there is the following account in a letter from General Grant to Earl Cornwallis: 'Sir Charles Grey's son, who comes in for Northumberland, in his first speech made a violent attack upon the Minister, who, in reply, said many civil things, complimented him upon his abilities, and took no notice of the abuse. Mr. Fox said nothing could be handsomer or better judged than Mr. Pitt's conduct on the occasion. But Grey has returned to the charge, and upon making a motion to inquire into the state of the Post Office, he made use of stronger language than ever was heard in the House of Commons, and was not approved by either party. The Minister was firm, and without losing temper treated his violence and threats with contempt. He was attacked at the same time by Fox and Sheridan, and in short with all the abilities of Opposition.'

In this last debate there was present a keen observer of many years' experience—the Right Hon. Richard Rigby. He now very seldom attended the House of Commons, but he expressed as follows to General Grant his impressions of that day: 'You know that I am not partial to Pitt, and yet I must own that he is infinitely superior to anything I ever saw in that House; and I declare that Fox and Sheridan and all of them put together are nothing to him. He, without support or assistance, answers them all with ease to himself, and they are just chaff before the wind to him.' [1]

It was hoped by the Opposition that there might arise in the commercial classes an impulse against the French Treaty as against the Irish Propositions. But this did not prove to be the case. Our merchants and manufacturers were upon the whole well pleased, or at least acquiescing and quiet. There came from any body of them to the House of Commons only one considerable petition, and that petition prayed only for postponement. Notwithstanding every effort, and in spite of all the eloquence of Fox and Sheridan, of Francis and Grey, an Address in approval of the Treaty was carried by overwhelming numbers—236 against 116.

In this Session the proceedings against Warren Hastings were resumed with unabated zeal. Witnesses were from time to time examined at the Bar; and on the 7th of February Sheridan brought forward the charge numbered as the fourth, and relating to the Begums of Oude. His speech on that occasion, taking up in the delivery five hours and forty minutes, and combining within it every kind of oratorical excellence, stands forth perhaps without a parallel in history from its effects upon its hearers. When he sat down, neither the Members in the House, nor the Peers below the Bar, nor even the strangers in the Gallery, could restrain their rapturous delight: they testified it contrary to all rule and precedent by the loud clapping of hands. An adjournment was moved by Sir William Dolben, who declared that in the state of mind in which that speech had left him, he was unable to form a determinate opinion; and Pitt, in supporting this adjournment, which was carried, observed that they were still under the wand of the enchanter.

Never certainly was there such unanimous testimony to surpassing merit. Burke declared this speech to be 'the most astonishing effort of eloquence, argument, and wit united of which there is any record or tradition.' Fox said: 'All that he had ever heard, all that he had ever read, when compared with it dwindled into nothing, and vanished like vapour before the sun.' And Pitt, though censuring some parts of it, as marked with unmeasured asperity to the person accused, did not hesitate to own that 'it surpassed all the eloquence of ancient and modern times, and possessed everything that genius or art could furnish to agitate and control the human mind.' Nor was this a mere transient impression of the hearers. More than fifteen years afterwards, Fox, being asked by his nephew, the late Lord Holland, which was the best speech ever made in the House of Commons, answered without hesitation, 'Sheridan's, on the Begum charge.'[1]

With such high certificates of merit who is there but would eagerly seek out the records or reports of this great oration, and who but would grieve on ascertaining that none, or next to none, are to be found? Only the day after, and in the midst of the general enthusiasm, Sheridan was offered a thousand pounds if he would himself correct it for the press. This, however, he left undone, perhaps it might be from indolence, or perhaps from a tender regard to his own fame. For certainly no human composition could fail to leave open some loopholes for attack, or could safely stand the test of comparison with the panegyrics which it had produced. Thus, beyond a most jejune and meagre outline in the Parliamentary History, nothing now remains of this great oration. It has gone to the same limbo as the speeches of Halifax and Bolingbroke, of Sir William Wyndham and Charles Townshend.

The adjourned debate upon Sheridan's motion was resumed on the following day. Francis spoke with much rancour against Hastings, and Major Scott at great length in his defence. Then Pitt rose. Going over the whole of the argument, and listened to in breathless suspense, since his opinion was as yet unknown, he declared that the conduct of Hastings to the Begums seemed to him utterly unjustifiable, and that the charge on that subject ought to be affirmed. It was affirmed accordingly, in the division, by a majority of more than two to one.

Other Charges were on other days brought forward by other Members. But the decisions of the House in the case of Benares, and in the case of the Begums, were of themselves sufficient to determine the question of State Trial. When, therefore, it came to be moved by Burke 'that there is ground for impeaching the said Warren Hastings, Esq., of high crimes and misdemeanors,' the Resolution was carried without the appearance of one dissenting vote. And on the 10th of May, Burke, with a great majority of members in his train, appeared at the bar of the House of Lords, and solemnly impeached Warren Hastings according to the ancient form. Shortly afterwards Hastings was taken into the custody of the Sergeant at Arms. Then he was transferred to the Black Rod. Finally he was admitted to bail, and the further prosecution of his trial was deferred till the ensuing year.

In this Session several important measures of financial reform were framed and carried by Pitt. There was the farming of the duty on post-horses, to guard against the minute but numerous frauds which had hitherto prevailed. There was the regulation of lotteries to suppress a gambling practice pernicious to the morals of the people, and called the insurance of tickets. But above all there was the consolidation of duties in the Customs, Excise, and Stamps. These duties having been imposed or augmented at different periods, and assigned to separate services, became at last in the highest degree complicated, and as such vexatious and oppressive, and scarce any payment could be determined without a series of calculations combined from several departments. But perhaps the best idea of these complications, and of the skill and patience required to unravel them, may be gathered from the fact that the remedial Resolutions moved by Pitt in the House of Commons—as abolishing the old duties and substituting new ones on a simpler plan—amounted in number to no less than 2537. Burke, on this occasion, did himself high honour. Instead of indulging any party-spirit, or seeking to find any fault with Pitt's proposal, 'it rather,' he said, 'behoves us to rise up manfully, and, doing justice to the Right Hon. gentleman's merit, to return him thanks on behalf of ourselves and of the country.'

Important as were these financial measures, the public looked with much keener interest to the discussions on the conduct of the Prince of Wales. Since 1783 His Royal Highness had set up a separate establishment, and unreservedly thrown himself into the arms of Opposition. With Fox especially, and Sheridan, he lived in familiar friendship. But whatever useful lessons he may have learned in that school, economy and thrift were certainly not among the number. It was not long ere he found himself deeply involved in debt. He had spent above 50,000*l.* in building at Carlton House; and most kinds of frolic and dissipation had their share. Altogether, in 1786, his liabilities amounted to upwards of 150,000*l.* These, however, were, it might be said, the faults of youth and inexperience. A graver subject of apprehension had meanwhile arisen. The Prince had become deeply enamoured of Mrs. Fitzherbert, a widow lady who held the Roman Catholic faith. She was of gentle birth, and of great beauty; and both in her widowhood and in her two former marriages had borne an irreproachable character. To avoid the Prince's importunities she had gone abroad in 1784, but on her return at the close of the ensuing year those importunities were renewed. Any legal alliance between them was impossible from the terms of the Royal Marriage Act; but, to quiet her scruples, the Prince offered to go through the religious ceremony. A rumour to that effect was quickly noised abroad; and Fox, in the true spirit of an honourable friend, wrote at once to His Royal Highness remonstrating in the strongest manner against this 'very desperate step.' The intention was denied, but it was persevered in. On the 21st of December, 1785, the ceremony was performed in private by a Clergyman of the Church of England, and in the form prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer: and the certificate, bearing the same date, was attested by two witnesses. Thus, it might be said, did the Heir Apparent attempt to take to wife a private gentlewoman in the teeth of the Royal Marriage Act, and a Roman Catholic in the teeth of the Act of Settlement. A breach of the law in the one alternative, or a forfeiture of the Crown in the other.

Fox, in his excellent letter to the Prince, had foretold that if the marriage took place at all, it could not be kept perfectly secret. Whispers of it soon began, and, though contradicted, grew. Men in general knew not what to believe as to the fact alleged; and the public uncertainty found a vent in the public press. Several pamphlets came forth upon this question; and one by Horne Tooke attracted especial notice from its boldness: for it maintained that the ceremony was perfectly legal, notwithstanding the provisions of the Royal Marriage Act, and he therefore spoke of Mrs. Fitzherbert without reserve as of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales.

So early as the spring of 1785, the Prince, through Lord Southampton, applied to the King for aid. He was met by a request for some explanation how in so short a time so enormous a debt had been incurred.

This natural inquiry was construed by the Prince as a direct refusal. In 1785 he stated his positive intention to go immediately abroad. In 1786 he no less positively announced that he would break up his entire establishment; he advertised for sale not only his stud and his hunters, but even his carriage and his riding-horses, declaring that he would henceforth walk on foot, and devote two-thirds of his income to the payment of his debts. He desired, no doubt, by this step to excite the public sympathy in his favour; but it does not appear that this object was in any degree attained.

In the spring of 1787 the Prince's friends, with his consent, if not at his instigation, determined to apply to Parliament for the payment of his debts, and for some addition to his income. Alderman Newnham gave notice of a motion with that view. Even the notice gave rise to some preliminary skirmishes, in the course of which Pitt declared that if, unhappily, this proposal were persisted in, he should feel it his duty to give it an absolute negative. And Mr. Rolle, the now celebrated member for Devonshire, rose to say that for his part, if such a motion were made, he would move the prevous question upon it, because the question itself 'went immediately to affect our Constitution both in Church and State.' These words were well understood as applying to the rumours of a secret marriage with a Roman Catholic lady.

Fox himself, as it chanced, was not present when Mr. Rolle was speaking; but in another of the preliminary debates took the opportunity of reverting to these words. In the most direct and peremptory terms that language could convey, he treated the report in question as an utter calumny. 'I know,' said Mr. Rolle, in rejoinder, 'that there are certain laws and Acts of Parliament which forbid it, but still there are ways in which it might have taken place.' 'I deny it altogether,' cried Fox: 'I deny it in point of fact as well as in law. The fact not only never could have happened legally, but never did happen in any way whatsoever; and was from the beginning a base and malicious falsehood.' 'Do you speak from authority?' asked Rolle. 'I do,' answered Fox, 'from direct authority.'

It is painful to carry this question further. It ought at least to give no pleasure to any one who has lived as a subject of King George the Fourth. On the other hand, the memory of an eminent statesman demands the fullest justice; and I am bound to state, without doubt or hesitation, as my view of the case, that Mr. Fox had no intention whatever of deceiving, but was himself deceived.

At the time, however, and on the report of what had passed in the House of Commons, Mrs. Fitzherbert, believing herself wronged, was most vehemently incensed against Fox. To the end of his life, indeed, she would never be reconciled to him. The Prince, on his part, was half distracted between his concern for the lady and his apprehensions from the public. He sent for Mr. Charles Grey, who found him, as he states, in an agony of agitation.[1] His Royal Highness now confessed that the ceremony of marriage had taken place, and he most earnestly pressed Grey to say something in Parliament for the satisfaction of Mrs. Fitzherbert; but this Grey steadily declined, and at length the Prince ended the conversation abruptly by exclaiming, 'Well, if nobody else will, Sheridan must!'

A few days later Sheridan accordingly, though with manifest embarrassment, addressed himself to this point in the House of Commons. He did not attempt, however, to controvert in the slighest degree the accuracy of Fox's statement, and merely referred to Mrs. Fitzherbert in some general expressions of respect and sympathy.

Meanwhile the best friends of the Monarchy, in and out of Parliament, had begun to feel that any public discussion on the Prince of Wales's affairs, even though confined to money matters, would be most unseemly. In compliance with the general wish, Pitt had two interviews with the Prince at Carlton House. 'He was to see the King to-night,' thus reports His Royal Highness to Fox, 'and would endeavour to get everything settled if he could.'[1] This was no easy task. George the Third was now more than ever incensed against his son, since the appeal which seemed to have been made from himself to the House of Commons. At last, however, a Royal Message was obtained and brought down, commending to the faithful Commons the payment of the Prince's debts, which amounted to 161,000*l.*, besides a grant of 20,000*l.* for the new works at Carlton House. 'His Majesty could not, however'—in these words the Message proceeds—'expect or desire the assistance of the House but on a well-grounded expectation that the Prince will avoid contracting any new debts in future. With a view to this object, His Majesty has directed a sum of 10,000*l.* a year to be paid out of his Civil List, in addition to the allowance which His Majesty has hitherto given him; and His Majesty has the satisfaction to inform the House that the Prince of Wales has given His Majesty the fullest assurances of his firm determination to confine his future expenses within his income.' How far these assurances were fulfilled may be seen in the sequel; but for the present the money was cheerfully voted, and the quarrel was hushed.

Half a century had now elapsed since the Protestant Dissenters had applied to Parliament for the repeal of the Test Act. In the Session of 1787 their effort was renewed. For the most part they had warmly espoused the cause of Pitt at the last General Election, and they thought themselves entitled to some share of his favour in return. Their first step was to circulate among the Members of the House of Commons a paper entitled 'The Case of the Protestant Dissenters with reference to the Corporation and Test Acts,' in which they more especially laboured to distinguish their case from that of the Roman Catholics. With equal prudence they selected as their spokesman Mr. Beaufoy, a member of the Church of England, and a zealous supporter of the Government.

Pitt appears to have felt a disposition to support their claims, if he could do so with the assent of the Church of England. Without that assent, as expressed by its heads, it was scarcely possible or scarcely proper for any Prime Minister to move onward. A meeting of the Bishops was held at the Bounty Office, on a summons from the Archbishop of Canterbury, and at the request, as the Bishops were informed, of Mr. Pitt. The question laid before their Lordships was as follows:—'Ought the Test and Corporation Acts to be maintained?' Of fourteen Prelates present, only two —Watson of Llandaff, and Shipley of St. Asaph—voted in the negative; and the decision of the meeting was at once transmitted to the Minister.[1]

When, on the 28th of March, Mr. Beaufoy did bring on his motion, Lord North spoke in opposition to it, and Fox in its favour. Pitt rose and said that he did not think he could with propriety give a silent vote. He observed that some classes of the Nonconformists had injured themselves in the public opinion greatly, and not unreasonably, by the violence and the prejudices which they had shown. 'Were we,' he said, 'to yield on this occasion, the fears of the members of the Church of England would be roused, and their apprehensions are not to be treated lightly. It must, as I contend, be conceded to me that an Established Church is necessary. Now there are some Dissenters who declare that the Church of England is a relic of Popery; others that all Church Establishments are improper. This may not be the opinion of the present body of Dissenters, but no means can be devised of admitting the moderate part of the Dissenters and excluding the violent; the bulwark must be kept up against all.'

The division which ensued gave no great hopes to the claimants. Only 98 members went with Mr. Beaufoy, while 176 declared against him.

In this Session of 1787 was passed the measure which laid the foundation of new Colonies, scarcely less important than those which we had recently lost. The want of some fixed place for penal exile had been severely felt ever since the American War, and the accumulation of prisoners at home was counteracting the benevolent efforts of Howard for the improvement of the British gaols. The discoveries of Captain Cook were now remembered and turned to practical account. An Act of Parliament empowered His Majesty, by Commission under the Great Seal, to establish a Government for the reception of convict prisoners in New South Wales. An Order in Council completed the necessary forms. Captain Arthur Phillip of the Royal Navy was appointed Governor, commanding a body of marines, and conveying six hundred male and two hundred and fifty female convicts. The expedition set sail in May, 1787; and early in the following year laid the foundation of the new settlement at Port Jackson in Botany Bay.

Notwithstanding the many important measures or debates of this Session, the business was conducted with so much despatch that Parliament could be prorogued on the 30th of May.

CHAPTER X.

State of parties in Holland—Differences respecting the French trade in India—Prussian troops enter Holland—Death of the Duke of Rutland—France and England disarm—Trial of Hastings—India Declaratory Bill—Budget—Claims of American Loyalists—First Steps in Parliament for the Abolition of the Slave Trade—Exertions of Wilberforce and Clarkson—Pitt's Resolution—Sir W. Dolben's Bill—Horrors of the Middle Passage—Controversies on Slavery.

For some months past the conflict of parties in the Dutch Republic had been the subject of much uneasiness and much deliberation to the Ministers in England. The Prince of Orange found his authority as Stadtholder not merely eluded, but struck at and defied. He had retired to Nimeguen, leaving Van Berkel and the other chiefs of the Democratic party in full possession of power at the Hague; and they on their part continued, as during the late war, closely connected with France, and obedient to every dictate that came from the Court of Versailles.

Such was the general picture of Holland at this time, but scarce any month elapsed without some fresh aggression or contumely on the Prince of Orange. In his own character there was nothing of spirit or energy; but both these qualities were possessed in a high degree by the Princess. She addressed in private earnest entreaties for aid to her brother, who had recently succeeded as King of Prussia, and also to the King of England. Sir James Harris, our Minister at the Hague, espoused her cause with zeal. We find him in his despatches constantly urge that if the Democratic party were allowed full play, Holland would sink ere long into a mere dependency and almost a province of France. These representations prevailed at once with Lord Carmarthen, the Secretary of State, who became not less eager in the cause than Sir James himself; but by Pitt they were more doubtfully received. Pitt indeed on this occasion, as on several others previous to the great crisis of 1793, proved himself to be in truth and emphatically a Peace Minister.

At the beginning of May, 1787, Sir James Harris wrote again to Lord Carmarthen, pressing with more than common urgency 'a plan of vigorous measures.' But since objections would of course arise, and explanations be required, he further suggested that he might himself go over for a few days to England. He received the desired permission, and was invited to attend two Cabinets that were held upon the subject. Of the first of these Cabinets his notes are still preserved. The Chancellor, he says, took the lead, and 'in the most forcible terms that could be employed, declared against all half-measures.' So did also, besides Lord Carmarthen, the Duke of Richmond and Lord Stafford. 'I own,' said Mr. Pitt, 'the immense importance of Holland being preserved as an independent State. It is certainly an object of the greatest magnitude. I have no hesitation as to what ought to be done, if we do anything at all; but if we do anything, we must make up our minds in the first instance to go to war as a possible, though not a probable, event. Now the mere possibility is enough to make it necessary for England to reflect before she stirs. It is to be maturely weighed whether anything could repay the disturbing that state of growing affluence and prosperity in which she now is, and whether this is not increasing so fast as to make her equal to meet any force France could collect some years hence.'[1]

At the last Cabinet, however, it was determined that a sum of 20,000*l.*, as derived from the Secret Service Fund, should be entrusted to Harris, and applied to assist our friends in Holland. Thus was Sir James enabled to return to his post armed with the same weapon as Jove (it is his own comparison) when invading the tower of Danae. In pursuit of the like policy, the Court of Versailles had sent to its Minister at the Hague a lavish letter of credit. 'And I can assure your Lordship'—thus had Sir James written on the 1st of May—'I keep greatly within the mark when I declare that in this period of time (a fortnight) France has expended at least a million of livres'

Holland was not the only field on which the Courts of London and Versailles seemed at this time likely to contend. A serious difference had arisen between them as to the extent and meaning of the thirteenth article of the Treaty of Peace, stipulating for the French trade in India; and the French on this occasion received the full support of the ruling party at the Hague. Both Powers had greatly increased their naval force in the Indian seas; and this increase alone (to say nothing of some new works at Pondicherry, and some fresh intrigues with Tippoo) gave us reason for apprehending a combined attack on our newly-conquered territories. Not that any result could at that time be foreseen with certainty from the feeble and fluctuating Governments of France. The Comte de Vergennes, who had concluded the Treaty of Commerce with us, had become unpopular with many of his countrymen on that account. The manufacturers of France were full of angry reproaches and of boding fears, and already in imagination saw their produce undersold and their looms deserted. Still, however, Vergennes had retained his credit at Court; but he died in February, 1787, and his death was followed at no long interval by the retirement of M. de Calonne, Minister of the Finances—a victim to that Assembly of Notables which he had himself convened. Then it was that the way was opened for the accession to power of a most vain and empty statesman, a mere minion of Court favour, Lomenie de Brienne, Archbishop of Toulouse. It was possible that he might incline to peace on account of the ruined state of the finances. It was equally possible that he might incline to war, as seeking to divert the people from their own distresses. But in any case it was most desirable for us to reinforce our garrisons in the East, to be ready with a powerful fleet, and, even on Indian grounds alone, to break the intimate concert of councils between the despotic Court of Versailles and the democratic rulers at the Hague.

A crisis in the affairs of Holland seemed to all parties near at hand, but the form in which it came at last was wholly unforeseen. Towards the close of June the Princess of Orange determined to go in person to the Hague. She carried with her letters from the Prince to the States-General and to the States of Holland, by which she was empowered to act or negotiate as circumstances might require; but at the frontier of the province her carriage was stopped by a detachment of Free Corps, and Her Royal Highness was detained in custody while the question was referred to the States. Finally, even after an answer had come from the Hague, she was prevented from proceeding on her journey, and obliged to return whence she came.

Such an insult to the wife of the Chief Magistrate of the Republic, and to the sister of a reigning Monarch, could only be atoned for by prompt apologies and adequate punishment of the offenders. The King of Prussia demanded this reparation in peremptory terms, and to enforce his demands he collected at Wesel an army of 20,000 men under the Duke of Brunswick. Even the Court of Versailles, on being consulted, owned that the act had been unjustifiable, and that the reparation was due; but the patriots (for so the Stadtholder's opponents called themselves) were rather inclined to defend the conduct of the soldiers, and blindly refused any, even the smallest, concession. They saw that they were not upheld by France on this particular occasion. Still they hoped that they might reckon on her general sympathy and succour, and they knew that at this very time she was forming for their sake a camp of 15,000 men at the frontier town of Givet. Therefore when threatened by the Prussian army, they in specific terms applied to France for protection.

In September the Court of France notified in form to the Court of London that it had determined to afford to the States-General the assistance they had requested. By Pitt's direction an immediate reply was returned to the purport that we on our side should take an active part in favour of the Stadtholder. Already, with characteristic energy, had the British Minister decided his measures. Despatches had been sent, both by sea and over land, to the Governor-General of Bengal and to the Governor of Madras, directing them to be prepared, in case of war, to attack the French settlements in India, and to take possession of the Dutch on the Stadtholder's behalf and in his name. At home, orders had been given to augment both our navy and army. A guarantee was sent to Berlin to promise our support in the event of French hostility. Nor was this merely a vague promise: we undertook to back the Duke of Brunswick's advance by a fleet of forty ships of the line. A treaty was concluded for the term of four years with the Landgrave of Hesse, by which that little potentate, ever ready as before to sell his subjects, agreed, in return for a yearly subsidy of 36,000*l.*—'a retaining fee,' as Pitt called it in the House of Commons—to send forth for our service a body of 12,000 troops whenever it might be required.

Yet the hopes of peace were still maintained. To assist in the negotiations on this subject, Mr. Grenville was despatched for some days to confer with the Ministers at Paris.

Hostilities were already in progress. On the 13th of September the Prussian troops entered the Dutch territory in three columns. Then it was that the utter weakness of the Democratic party came to be apparent. Almost everywhere the Prussians were received not as foemen, but rather as liberators and allies. Almost everywhere the Orange flag was hoisted, the Orange ribbons were worn. So easy and so rapid was the Duke of Brunswick's progress that in the course of eight days the whole of the United Provinces, except Amsterdam, had yielded to him, and even Amsterdam surrendered after only a fortnight's siege. The Prince of Orange made his triumphal entry into the Hague amidst the loudest acclamations and every sign of public joy, and he found himself reinstated in all his former rights and powers as Stadtholder. 'Your Lordship,' so writes Harris to Carmarthen, 'on reading this letter, will, I am sure, consider its contents as incredible; and I confess I can scarce bring myself to believe what has passed. . . . . If St. Priest (the French Minister) comes soon, he must enter the Hague decorated with Orange-coloured ribbons, or else he will not be suffered to enter it at all.'

Pitt had for this summer planned an excursion to the north. His friend Wilberforce, who had now given up his villa at Wimbledon, had on the other hand taken one among the Lakes, and looked forward to make the Prime Minister acquainted with his favourite scenes. The 'Public Advertiser' of June 20, 1787, contains the following paragraph :—'Mr. Pitt, in his way into Scotland, will take Alnwick, Castle Howard, and other principal places, but he will not make any stay, except with Mr. Wilberforce.' Unhappily, however, the affairs of Holland marred this agreeable scheme. Pitt went no farther north than Cambridgeshire. But his progress, and the progress also of public events, will be best illus-

Downing Street, September 13, 1787.

I returned yesterday from Cheveley, which I reached on the preceding Monday, and had the pleasure of finding my brother and Lady Chatham established very much to their satisfaction. My visit was not a long one, but afforded me a good deal of riding in the way there and back, and as good a day's sport of shooting as could be had without ever killing. I was in some hopes of returning again the end of the week; but as I find things are clearly coming to a point in Holland, and a very few days may now decide a good deal as to the future, I shall hardly stir further than Holwood for some days.

Downing Street, September 19, 1787.

I am just going to Wimbledon to dine with M. de Calonne at his villa there, and hear all the politics of France, which form no bad variety in the interval of our own.

Downing Street, September 22, 1787.

My dear Mother,—The business abroad is at length come to a point, and with every appearance of success. France has indeed notified to us that she will give assistance to the province of Holland, and we are therefore under the necessity of preparing with vigour, and are accordingly pressing to arm the fleet. But there seems still every reason to think France will quickly give way, as she has no army prepared, and in the mean time the Duke of Brunswick's success is in a manner decisive. News came last night that most of the towns in Holland had surrendered without any resistance. A complete revolution had taken place at the Hague, and the States of Holland had resolved to restore the Stadtholder to all his rights, and invited him back to the Hague. The only question is whether the Free Corps will make any stand at the Hague. If the issue there is as favourable as may be expected, every effort the French can make will come too late; and they will hardly engage in an unpromising contest for a mere point of honour. You will not wonder if I have not time to write more at present. Pray give my love to Eliot, and affectionate compliments to Mrs. Stapleton. Ever, my dear Mother, &c.,

W. Pitt.

It happens that there is just now a vacancy in the place of Housekeeper to the Levee Rooms at Whitehall, which may be executed by deputy, and has, indeed, hardly anything to do. I am sorry to say it is worth no more than 40*l.* a year; but as there are so few places of this kind which do not require some attendance, if you think Mrs. Sparry[1] would like this, as a mark of old friendship, I shall be much obliged to you if you will have the goodness to propose it to her.

Downing Street, September 29, 1787.

This last fortnight has not allowed me to make much use of it anywhere, nor to venture so far as Holwood; but I trust it has been better employed. We are, I flatter myself, going on very satisfactorily in our preparations, only, what is much pleasanter, there is at present every reason to think we shall not be obliged to use them, and shall carry our point quietly. It may still, however, be a fortnight or three weeks before we can judge decisively, as we must allow time for consulting at Berlin; and in that interval one cannot be quite sure that some change of circumstances may not produce new intentions. At present all looks pacific, though each side must continue to arm till a final explanation takes place. You will not wonder if I have not time for much but this sort of news at present. . . . I rejoice that Mrs. Sparry likes my proposal.

Downing Street, October 13, 1787.

My dear Mother,—I write one line to say things are going on well. Amsterdam, though it has not actually opened its gates, has submitted to everything, and the settlement in Holland seems likely to be peaceably completed. France will probably in the end acquiesce, but we continue to be watchful in the mean time. Admiral Hood, who has been called to town again on account of some of the objects which may possibly arise, gives me the satisfaction of receiving a very good account of you. I hope the weather is still favourable to your drives. Adieu.

Ever, my dear Mother, &c., &c., W. Pitt.

Downing Street, October 29, 1787.

My dear Mother,—The newspapers have probably conveyed to you the accounts which have arrived within these few days of the health of the poor Duke of Rutland. You will, I am sure, on many grounds, have entered into the anxiety which I must feel on this subject. It is therefore with additional regret I write to tell you that I received last night the affecting news of his death. His illness was a fever which had been hanging upon him for some time, and which within a few days took an unfavourable turn, and proved of the putrid sort. I am informed by his agent that by his will (which is in Ireland) he has appointed me as one of his executors and guardians of his children, a mark of kindness and confidence which must add to what I feel for him. I am sorry to dwell on so melancholy a subject, but still I thought it better you should learn it from my pen than through any other channel.

You will, I am sure, excuse my not having found time to return Mr. Coutts's letter sooner. I should have been very glad on every account to have been able to obtain his request. But on speaking to Lord Sydney about it, it seemed from the line which the King has laid down to be a point which could not well be attempted.

The account of the dear little girl made me, you will easily believe, very happy; I have not heard from Eliot himself very lately, but by an indirect channel I have just had very good accounts of him. I expect every hour news from Paris which I think likely to put an end to the present suspense to our perfect satisfaction, but there is no certainty on such a subject till it is actually completed. Affectionate compliments to Mrs. Stapleton, and kind remembrances to Mrs. Sparry. Ever, my dear Mother, &c.,

W. Pitt.

The expectations held out in this last letter of good news from Paris were most speedily fulfilled. Two days before its date the French Ministers announced in form to the British ambassador that they had relinquished any hostile design against the new Government of Holland; and on the same day, the 27th of October, a Joint Declaration was signed at Paris, by which France and England agreed that the armaments and warlike preparations should be discontinued on each side. Thus was happily averted the war which we had bravely dared; and thus amidst general satisfaction was renewed our ancient and close alliance with the United Provinces.

The judgment on the whole of this transaction of Count Woronzow, the Russian ambassador in London, seems well worthy of record. He wrote to his brother to the following effect: 'The part played by England in these affairs has been brilliant and courageous, and the conduct of Mr. Pitt on this occasion is very like that which his late father pursued. Such conduct was very little known and very little practised in England during the interval between his father's retirement and his own accession to power. I had so strong an attachment and so thorough a respect for the late Lord Chatham, that I take a warm interest in the conduct and character of his son. How would the father have rejoiced in them had he lived on till now!'[1]

At the same time and at the opposite extremity of Europe another contest was raging. The Sultan and the Czar were again at strife, and the Emperor Joseph the Second was preparing to join the Russian side. But the war having been commenced with great rashness and some appearance of ill faith on the part of Turkey, there was the less sympathy for the disasters which her arms ere long sustained.

The satisfaction of Pitt at the maintenance of peace to England was grievously damped by the unhappy news from Dublin. Besides the loss of his early friend there was the check to the prosperous course of Irish business. There was the difficulty, and a very great one, in the choice of a successor. To the surprise of many persons the choice of Pitt fell upon the Marquis of Buckingham.

With the prospect of a war impending, it was judged right to convene the Parliament before Christmas. Parliament met accordingly on the 27th of November, after the alarm had passed. During the last Session the views of Fox had been so strongly expressed as Anti-Gallican—he had in speaking of the Treaty of Commerce so thundered against all French objects and French alliances—that he was already and by anticipation pledged to the approval of our recent policy with respect to Holland. That approval he did express in strong terms, though not without several qualifications and reserves; and his approval ceased when the Minister proposed a permanent increase of our land forces to the amount of 3,000 men for the better security of our West Indian islands. 'No person,' said Pitt, 'can be more anxious on the subject of expense than I am. But I contend that any moderate expense by which the continuance of peace could be more firmly ensured is true economy, and the best economy this country can adopt. It is upon this principle, and after a full consideration of the state of our finances, that I think it would be wise to lay out 200,000*l.* in fortifications, and 80,000*l.* annually, the sum which the proposed augmentation of troops would cost, for the purpose of strengthening those parts of our dominions which are discovered to be weak and vulnerable, and of keeping them in such a constant posture of defence as may deter any hostile power from attempting to seize them by surprise.' Fox divided the House against the proposal, but it was affirmed by 242 votes against 80.

Before Christmas there was another subject of sharp contention. The House of Lords having fixed the 13th of February for the commencement of Hastings's Trial, it became necessary for the House of Commons to appoint its Managers. The first place was by common consent allowed to the genius, the long experience, and the inexhaustible Indian knowledge of Burke. He was desirous that Pitt and Dundas should also consent to act as Managers, but from their ties of office they declined. So likewise did Lord North, whose eye-sight had become impaired, and whose health began to decline.

On the whole, then, upon the refusal of Pitt and of Dundas to serve, the conductors of the Impeachment came to be chosen wholly from the front rank of Opposition. Besides Burke himself as Chairman, they comprised Fox and Fitzpatrick, Burgoyne and Windham, Sheridan and Grey. No difference of opinion was manifested until Burke proposed the name of Philip Francis. At his name, and considering the rancorous hostility against Hastings which Francis had even lately shown, there arose in the minds of many Members a strong feeling of disapprobation. The motion was quickly negatived, but on another day it was renewed by Fox. 'It is not a question of argument, it is a question of feeling,' said Pitt. 'Ought we to appoint as our representative in the present Impeachment the only person in the House who has upon a former occasion been concerned in a personal contest—a duel—with Mr. Hastings?' Moreover, it is to be observed that only a few months before Pitt had publicly charged Francis with 'dishonourable and disgraceful' proceedings in the recent evidence of Captain Mercer. Nevertheless Dundas declared that he should vote for the appointment; which, considering his close friendship with Pitt at this period, and the cordial concert of measures between them on every other point, appears extraordinary, and is best explained perhaps by some previous pledge or assurance unwarily given to Francis by Dundas. Francis himself spoke in his own case with great ability, and, almost incredible as it may seem in him, with great temper; but on a division he was again rejected by a majority of two to one.

On the 17th of December the House of Commons adjourned to the last day of January. Pitt immediately availed himself of his holidays to pay a visit to his mother, but he returned to Downing Street on the last day of December.

On the re-assembling of Parliament the public expectation was most eagerly turned to the great day as it was termed—the 13th of February—the first of Hastings's Trial. At length the great day came. Westminster Hall was prepared. Thither at eleven in the morning walked the Commons, Mr. Burke leading the procession. He and the other Managers were clad in Court attire, with bag wigs and swords, but the other Members in their common dresses, and they took their seats as respectively assigned them. Then, and not till after they had mustered, the Peers began to move in established form from their own Chamber. First went the Clerks, then the Masters in Chancery, then the Judges, ready to be consulted whenever any point of law might arise, after them a Herald, then the Peers who were minors and the eldest sons of Peers, then the Usher of the Black Rod, then lastly the Lords of Parliament themselves.[1] They wore their rich robes of scarlet with rows of ermine and gold, and they walked two and two, marshalled in their right rank by Garter King of Arms, and the lowest in rank and precedency leading the way. The first in their procession as the Junior Baron was certainly one of the most conspicuous of their number, Lord Heathfield, lately raised to the peerage for his heroic defence of Gibraltar. Walking by his side was the statesman so long and bitterly denounced as the Minister of back-stairs influence—as the sole dispenser of the King's secret will—Charles Jenkinson, now Lord Hawkesbury. The stately procession closed with the Archbishops of York and Canterbury, the Duke of Norfolk as Earl Marshal, the Earl Camden as Lord President, and other high officers of ancient state; then came the Peers of the Blood Royal, the Prince of Wales the last, and the whole ending by the Chancellor, Lord Thurlow, as Chairman of the House. In passing to their seats they all uncovered and bowed

[1] See the rules, strictly according to former precedent, laid down in the Lords' Journals, February 5 and 11, 1788. One entry is 'that the Members of the House of Commons be there before the Lords come.'

to the Throne. The entire number present was of Prelates eighteen, and of lay-Peers one hundred and twenty-three.[1]

The boxes and the galleries on every side were thronged with ladies. There sat the Queen and the four princesses, not however having come in state, nor sitting in the Royal box, but in the Duke of Newcastle's. Much as they might be gazed at, still more eager looks of curiosity perhaps were directed to another quarter of the Hall, where Mrs. Fitzherbert appeared.

Silence being first commanded, the Serjeant at Arms made proclamation in quaint old phrase: 'Warren Hastings, come forth; save thee and thy Bail, or else thou forfeits thy Recognizance.' Then every eye was turned to see the accused man enter. He was dressed in a plain poppy-coloured suit of clothes; he seemed infirm and ill, and moved forward slowly, with one of his sureties at each side. He was attended also by his Counsel, men of shining ability and high subsequent rank: Law, afterwards Lord Ellenborough, and Chief Justice of the King's Bench; Dallas, afterwards Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; and Plumer, afterwards Vice-Chancellor and Master of the Rolls. Thus did Hastings advance to the Bar, where, as ancient form prescribed, he dropped upon his knees until the Chancellor bade him rise. Once before in the previous Session, when admitted to give bail, had Hastings undergone the same humiliation. When he rose the Chancellor next addressed him in a short speech as opening the Trial, and Hastings replied in the following few words: 'My Lords, I am come to this high tribunal equally impressed with a confidence in my own

[1] The number is variously stated by different writers: thus, Lord Macaulay makes it 'near a hundred and seventy,' and Mr. Gleig 'upwards of two hundred.' They had forgotten that in the Journals of the House the names of the Peers present each day are exactly recorded.

integrity, and in the justice of the Court before which I stand.'

We may observe that in all this trying scene it was the humiliation of the posture that seems to have rankled most in Hastings's mind. In a letter some months afterwards to his friend Mr. Thompson, we find him say: 'I can with truth affirm that I have borne with indifference all the base treatment I have had dealt to me—all except the ignominious ceremonial of kneeling before the House.'

But the interest of this great day wholly ceased as soon as the preliminaries ended and the business itself began. For then the Clerk at the Table was directed to read forth at length the Charges and the Answers —documents already well known to one part of the audience, and nearly unintelligible to the other. The Clerk read on so long as daylight lasted, but then he had only reached the close of the seventh article, and the remainder were reserved to consume the second day.

On the third day of the great Trial Burke rose and commenced his opening speech, designed as a general introduction to all the Charges. It extended through four days: a sustained and wonderful effort of eloquence, worthy the man, the occasion, and the audience. Even the hostile Chancellor was stirred to some cordial words of admiration.

On a subsequent day the Charge relating to Cheyte Sing was opened by Fox, with the aid of Grey. In such hands we may be well assured that the weapon of attack was brandished with shining lustre and hurled with unerring aim. Of the future Premier of King William the Fourth we find Burke write about this time to Sheridan in an almost prophetic strain: 'Grey has done much, and will do everything.'

The next case, that of the Begums of Oude, had been entrusted to the care of Sheridan. He made a speech, not equalling indeed his own masterpiece upon the same subject in the House of Commons, yet still in a high degree beautiful and brilliant. While it was still in progress—and it took up three entire days—Burke, who stood next to Fox, turning round to him, exclaimed: 'There—that is the true style—something between poetry and prose, and better than either!'[1]

The public interest which had been so keen and eager at the opening of Hastings's Trial, and during the great orations of his principal antagonists, soon afterwards ebbed, and never rose high again. In the first place the gloss of novelty had worn away. But above all, there had now to the splendours of a pageant or to the triumphs of eloquence, succeeded the dull realities of business. Instead of Heralds and Kings at Arms glittering in state-dresses, or Burke and Fox rivalling the records of Greek and Roman fame, there were now the Clerks mumbling forth tedious documents, or Counsel brow-beating reluctant witnesses. Another dispiriting circumstance was the slow progress made. Even in the Court of Chancery it could scarcely have been slower. During the Session of 1788 the Peers sat thirty-five days in Westminster Hall, yet the Managers for the Impeachment could do no more than complete their second Charge; and it was plain that years must roll away ere any decision was pronounced.

There was a wish in some quarters to urge yet another impeachment—that of Sir Elijah Impey, the first Chief Justice of India under the Act of 1773. Early in the Session Sir Gilbert Elliot had brought forward six Charges against him. Sir Elijah, now a Member of the House, spoke at great length and with no mean ability in his own defence. The discussion was resumed in May, when Pitt declared that in no view could any corrupt motive be brought home to Sir Elijah Impey, and that he had never voted with a more decided conviction of mind than in giving his negative to the present motion. Yet when the House divided at past seven in the morning, the majority in Sir Elijah's favour was by no means a large one: only 73 against 55. All idea, however, of an impeachment fell to the ground.

Pitt had also been not a little busy with another Indian question in the House of Commons. The alarm of war having ceased, the East India Directors were found no longer willing, as they had been while that alarm prevailed, to send out troops in their ships to India, or to maintain them after they had landed. These gentlemen asserted that unless they had themselves made a requisition for a further military force, they were not liable to defray it under the Act of 1781, which they considered as still binding; and they supported their view of the case by the opinion of several eminent Counsel. On the other hand, Mr. Pitt, upheld by the Crown Lawyers, contended that the Act of 1784 had transferred to the Board of Control all the powers and authorities which had been formerly vested in the Court of Directors; and that those parts of the Act of 1781 inconsistent with the Act of 1784 were by the latter virtually if not expressly repealed.

It was impossible to allow any uncertainty to remain on so important a point. On the 25th of February Mr. Pitt moved for leave to bring in a Bill for removing any doubts as to the power of the Commissioners for the Affairs of India in defraying from the Indian revenues the charge of transporting and maintaining troops. It was commonly called the India Declaratory Bill.

The Directors on their part presented a petition against the Bill, and on the 3rd of March they were heard by their Counsel at the Bar. They had sent Erskine and Rous. Erskine seems to have shown, as usual with him whenever he had not a jury to address, an entire miscalculation of the feelings of his audience. His two speeches, delivered the same day, are described in no complimentary terms in a letter addressed to the Marquis of Buckingham at Dublin Castle, by the Earl of Mornington, afterwards the Marquis Wellesley. Allowance must certainly be made for a strong bias both of party spirit and of personal regard to Mr. Pitt. Yet still we find the writer in positive terms refer as follows to the second speech: 'Erskine now spoke for near two hours, and delivered the most stupid, gross, and indecent libel against Pitt that ever was imagined. The abuse was so monstrous that the House hissed him at his conclusion.'

The result of this evening was by no means unfavourable to the Minister. 'Pitt,' says Lord Mornington, 'took no sort of notice of Erskine's Billingsgate;' and the division was a very good one. 'We reckon this a great triumph,' so Lord Mornington continues. But the next ensuing debate took an adverse turn. Only two days later the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland received a far from satisfactory letter from his brother William. 'I am very sorry,' so writes Mr. Grenville on the 6th of March, 'to send you in return for all your good news an account from hence of a very different nature. . . . . You must often have observed that of all impressions the most difficult to be removed are those which have no reason whatever to support them, because against them no reasoning can be applied. Under one of these impressions the question of the Speaker's leaving the Chair (on the Declaratory Bill) came on last night, and after debating till seven this morning, we divided in a majority of only 57 : Ayes 182, Noes 125. So many of our friends were against us in this division that I have serious apprehensions of our being beat either to-morrow on the Report, or Monday on the Third Reading. . . . . What hurt us, I believe materially, last night, was that Pitt, who had reserved himself to answer Fox, was just at the close of a very able speech of Fox's taken so ill as not to be able to speak at all, so that the House went to the division with the whole impression of our adversaries' arguments in a great degree unanswered. I had spoken early in the debate, and Dundas just before Fox.

I think this is the most unpleasant thing of the sort that has ever happened to us.'

A few days afterwards we find another Member, Lord Bulkeley, supply Lord Buckingham with some further details. Lord Bulkeley, I may observe, unlike Lord Mornington or Mr. Grenville, was a Member of no weight and authority, and judged from his own letters may be regarded as a gossiping, shallow man; yet still he appears a fair witness as to what he may himself have seen or heard in the House of Commons. 'Your brother William,' so he writes to the Marquis, 'suffered a mortification last Wednesday (the 5th) which I am told has vexed him. The moment he got up to speak, the House cleared as it used to do at one time when Burke got up. I hope it proceeded from accident, for if it continues it must hurt him very essentially. The day after he was in uncommon low spirits and croaked very much. There seems a general complaint of Pitt's young friends who never get up to speak, and I am not surprised at their timidity, for Fox, Sheridan, Burke, and Barré are formidable opponents on the ground they now stand upon. Young Grey has not yet spoke on either of these last days, and he is hitherto a superior four-year-old to any of our side.

'But,' so continues Lord Bulkeley in the same letter, 'these triumphs were, however, of short duration to the Opposition, for on Friday (the 7th) Pitt made one of the best and most masterly speeches he ever made, and turned the tables effectually on Opposition by acquiescing in such shackles as they chose to put on the article of patronage, all which they had pressed from an idea that Pitt on that point would be inflexible. This speech of Pitt's infused spirit into his friends. Dundas spoke very well, and contrary to expectation so did Scott and Macdonald. Government kept up their numbers in the division, and Opposition lost ten.' [1]

The changes made by Pitt in this Bill were, it seems, fully sufficient to obviate the objections which it had raised. There was no serious difficulty in any of its further stages either in the Commons or in the Lords.

Pitt brought forward the Budget on the 5th of May. It was a most satisfactory statement of the national finances. The extraordinary expenses of the year amounted to no less than 1,282,000*l.*, which arose chiefly from the late armament and from the payment of the debts of the Prince of Wales. Yet such was the flourishing state of the revenue that it afforded the means of defraying all these expenses without incurring either a loan or new taxes, and without any interruption to the progress of the Sinking Fund.

In this estimate, however, Pitt observed that he did not include one article of large amount and of a peculiar nature, as to which he would explain his plan on a future day—he alluded to the claims of the American Loyalists.

In considering the case of these ill-fated men, it may, I think, be asserted that the conduct of some at least of the United States since the Treaty with England, so far from being conciliatory, had not been even just. On this point we may fairly appeal to the testimony of one of their most eminent statesmen, John Adams, at this time American Minister at the Court of St. James's. Thus do we find him write in strict confidence to a kinsman of his own at Boston: 'The most insuperable bar to all my negotiations here has been laid by those States which have made laws against the Treaty. The Massachusetts is one of them. The law for suspending execution for British debts, however coloured or disguised, I make no scruple to say to you is a direct breach of the Treaty. Did my ever dear, honoured, and beloved Massachusetts mean to break her public faith? I cannot believe it of her. Let her then repeal the law without delay.' [1]

[1] Letter dated May 26, 1786, Works, vol. ix. p. 548.

But these commercial obstacles, however far from just, did not weigh so heavily in England as the denial of even the most qualified forgiveness to the former adherents of the Royal cause. That some indulgence, or rather some mitigation of severity, might have been shown them soon after the peace by their victorious countrymen, was the opinion at this time of no less a man than Dr. Franklin;[1] but this the rancour of the recent conflict unhappily prevented. The recommendations on this subject to the Legislatures of the several States, as enjoined by the Treaty of Peace, had been made in the coldest terms, and merely as a matter of form. Thus it became obvious that if any provision at all was to be made for the American Loyalists, the entire weight of it must fall on England.

Under these circumstances, and the claims pouring in in great numbers and on every possible plea, Pitt had early in his administration named several Commissioners to sift and report upon the divers cases. The inquiry proved long and laborious. Three thousand applications had been sent in by heads of families, and of these no more than two-thirds could be heard and decided in England. For the remainder it was necessary to depute Commissioners both to Canada and Nova Scotia; and thus whole years elapsed; but meanwhile the sum of 500,000*l.* had been allotted to meet the more pressing cases of distress.[2] At length the inquiries having been closed, and the reports presented, Pitt took the whole subject into review; and in the comprehensive scheme which he formed upon it, sought to combine the two main objects of compassion and economy. He divided the Loyalists into three classes. The first and most deserving to consist of those who had been resident in

[2] The most authentic history (or, as the writer prefers calling it, 'historical view') of the proceedings of this Commission was published in 1815 by Mr. John Eardley Wilmot, who had been one of the Commissioners. America at the commencement of the war, and who, in consequence of their attachment to the Crown, had been driven into exile and despoiled of their estates. The second class of those who had been resident in England, but who had lost property in America. The third of those who had either held places or exercised professions in America, and had been compelled to leave that country by the war. With this division of classes, Pitt proposed that the smaller claims (those under 10,000*l.*) should be paid in full, while on the others there should be a per-centage of deduction, increasing as the claim increased, and also according to the class. Yet with all these deductions there was still one sum of 70,000*l.* awarded to a single claim—that of Mr. Harford; and the total sum to be distributed, in addition to the half million already advanced, amounted to 1,228,000*l.* Further, it was proposed that the money should be paid by instalments, to be raised by the profits of a lottery to commence in the following year.

This scheme, comprising also a settlement of the East Florida claims to the further extent of 113,000*l.*, was welcomed by all parties in the House as no less generous than prudent and well framed. Both Burke and Fox rose to express their approbation, and it passed unanimously. Thus was afforded to the world a great and memorable, and it may even be said unparalleled, example of national bounty and consideration at the close of an unprosperous war. Seldom indeed, either in public or in private, do we find gratitude evinced and rewards bestowed for zeal which has proved altogether unavailing, and for services that can never be renewed.

The Session of 1788 is further memorable for the first steps in Parliament for the abolition of the Slave Trade. In the earlier part of the century that traffic—the Asiento, as in one word it was emphatically called—had been by no means a matter of shame. It was anxiously sought by commercial enterprise. It was as anxiously secured by diplomatic treaties. The public feeling began to be turned against it by the case of James Somersett in 1772. Somersett was an African slave who had been brought to England by his master, but having there absconded was by that master seized and sent on shipboard. The case being referred to the Judges, it was by them at last established as a fixed principle of law, that as soon as any slave sets his foot upon English ground he becomes free.

A lull ensued upon the subject during the American contest; but the Quakers especially had become alive to the iniquity of the traffic in slaves. It is much to their honour that when in May, 1787, a Committee of Management was formed against it, with a benevolent gentleman, Mr. Granville Sharpe, as Chairman, there were only two of the twelve members of that Committee who did not belong to the Society of 'Friends.'

Among those who at this early period took an active part in the good cause may be named Sir Charles and Lady Middleton, Mr. Bennet Langton, the Rev. James Ramsay (who had recently published an 'Essay on the Treatment of the Slaves,' derived from his own observation in the West India Islands), and last, not least, Mr. Thomas Clarkson, whose great labours and services are not to be obscured even by his own undue exaggeration of them. But in the arduous struggle that now commenced against the partisans of Slavery, by far the greatest share of praise and honour belongs as of right to the honoured name of Wilberforce.

Already had the mind of Mr. Wilberforce been trained and moulded for this, as it proved, the main business of his life. In the course of the year 1785 he had received a strong religious impulse, and determined to apply himself solely to religious objects. He wrote to his principal friends to explain his change of views. Some of them received the communication with displeasure. One of them angrily threw his letter into the fire. Still less did the Opposition in the first instance show him that reverent confidence which in after years he so fully attained. Thus, for instance, in the mock Journal of Mr. Dundas, which is annexed to some editions of the 'Rolliad,' there is an entry from this very year 1788:—'Came home in a very melancholy mood—drank a glass of brandy—determined to reform, and sent to Wilberforce for a good book—a very worthy and religious young man that—like him much—always votes with us.'

It was natural that with these earnest aspirations Mr. Wilberforce should now apply himself to ascertain how far the charges against the Slave Traders were or were not well founded. In his own words:—'I got together at my house, from time to time, persons who knew anything about the matter. . . . When I had acquired so much information, I began to talk the matter over with Pitt and Grenville. Pitt recommended me to undertake its conduct as a subject suited to my character and talents. At length, I well remember, after a conversation in the open air, at the root of an old tree at Holwood, just above the steep descent into the vale of Keston, I resolved to give notice, on a fit occasion, in the House of Commons, of my intention to bring the subject forward.'

I may add that this very tree, conspicuous for its gnarled and projecting root, on which the two friends had sat, is still pointed out at Holwood, and is known by the name of 'Wilberforce's oak.'

In this concert of measures Pitt agreed that a Committee of the Privy Council should be appointed to take evidence on the African trade. Wilberforce on his part gave notice of a motion in the House of Commons. But by this time the West India merchants and planters were thoroughly alarmed. They urged the Members for Liverpool and other great ports to make a determined stand. They prepared some texts of the Old Testament which they thought convenient for their purpose. They brought forward witnesses to prove not merely the necessity, but the absolute humanity, of the Slave Trade. And even the zeal of Wilberforce could not hide from himself the probable strength and power of that great interest. Here is one entry from his journal at the commencement of 1788: "Called at Pitt's at night: he firm about African trade, though we begin to perceive more difficulties in the way than we had hoped there would be.'

It so chanced that ere the day appointed for the motion the health of Mr. Wilberforce failed. He found himself disabled from active business, and compelled to try the waters of Bath. Before he went, however, he obtained from Pitt a promise that if his illness should continue through the spring, Pitt himself would supply his place. Accordingly, on the 9th of May, the Prime Minister rose to move a Resolution, 'That this House will early in the next Session proceed to take into consideration the circumstances of the Slave Trade.' With a reserve imposed upon him by official duty, he added that he should forbear from stating or even glancing at his own opinion until the moment of discussion should arrive. 'I understand, however,' said Fox, 'that the opinion of the Right Hon. Gentleman is primâ facie the same as my own. . . . For myself I have no scruple to declare that the Slave Trade ought not to be regulated, but destroyed. To this opinion my mind is pretty nearly made up. . . . I have considered the subject very minutely, and did intend to have brought something forward in the House respecting it. But I rejoice that it should be in the hands of the Hon. Member for Yorkshire rather than in mine. From him I honestly think that it will come with more weight, more authority, and more probability of success.' These words, which redound so highly to Mr. Fox's honour, were followed by words not less decided from Mr. Burke and from Sir William Dolben, Member for the University of Oxford.

Against an array of opinions such as these, Mr.

Bamber Gascoyne and Lord Penrhyn, the Members for Liverpool, and almost officially the spokesmen for the Slave Trade, could make no effectual stand. They deemed it wisest to let the Resolution pass unopposed, and to reserve their strength for the ensuing year. And that strength was certainly far greater than at first it seemed. The opinion of Mr. Pitt had not prevailed with all his colleagues. Lord Thurlow, above all, was, and continued to be, favourable to the Slave Trade, and unhappily he found means to instil nearly the same prejudice into the mind of the King.

These differences came to light much sooner than was expected. Sir William Dolben and some of his friends had gone to see with their own eyes the actual state of a slave-ship then fitting out in the Thames. They came back deeply impressed with pity, indignation, and shame. They found, as Sir William afterwards declared in the House of Commons, that the poor slaves had not one yard square allowed them to live in. Moreover, in that narrow space they were loaded with shackles. They were fastened together hand to hand and foot to foot.[1] The suffering and the sickness that must ensue might be readily conceived, and could scarcely be exaggerated. Not a moment, said Sir William, should be lost in arresting such intolerable evils and abuses. Accordingly, while he left the general question as already voted for debate in the ensuing year, he brought in a temporary Bill providing divers precautions, and above all limiting the numbers to be conveyed—one slave to each ton of the vessel's burden.

At the introduction of this Bill the Members for Liverpool raised a piteous cry. They denounced it both as unnecessary and as ruinous. In their resentment they appear to have even taunted Sir William Dolben as unmindful of former hospitality. 'I should indeed be a most ungrateful man,' said Dolben, 'if I forgot the merchants of Liverpool. I believe that I have eaten more turtle there than anywhere else in the course of my life; but I would readily give up their turtle and Burgundy for mock-turtle and plain Port if they would consent to forego some part of their profits for the sake of better accommodation to the poor negroes while on shipboard.'

The Bill of Sir William Dolben, being moderate in its aim and supported both by Pitt and Fox, passed triumphantly through the Commons. But in the other House Lord Thurlow fell upon it with great fury. He was backed by two Peers who had gained just distinction in a better cause—Lord Heathfield and Lord Rodney. And it was with great difficulty, and not until the last day of the Session, that there passed a measure on the subject, though curtailed of its first proportions.

The result so far, however, was encouraging to the Committee of Management under Mr. Granville Sharpe. They despatched Mr. Clarkson as their agent from place to place, partly to obtain information, and partly to diffuse their opinions. For their own seal they had chosen a design well adapted for popular effect. It represented an African in chains, kneeling with one knee upon the ground, and raising his hands in supplication, while around him the motto ran: 'Am I not a man and a brother?'

Of the gross exaggerations and misstatements which were at this time put forward in defence of the Slave Trade one instance may suffice. Several of the dealers or captains had not scrupled to assert that the Middle Passage was perhaps the happiest period of the negroes' lives; that they were constantly well fed; that the close air below in the holds was congenial to their frame of body; and that when upon deck they made merry and amused themselves with their national dances But the real facts were disclosed by the evidence before the Privy Council. It was found that the poor wretches were chained two and two together, and secured by ring-bolts to the lower decks. The allowance for each was one pint of water daily, and they had two meals of yams and horse-beans. After eating they were loosened from their rings, and allowed to jump up in their irons, as an exercise necessary for their health; and for that reason it was not only permitted but urged on them by lashes whenever they refused. And such, then, were the 'national dances' which had been so boldly and boastfully alleged!

In comparing the controversies on Slave Trade and on Slavery as they once prevailed in England, and as they still prevail in the United States, we may feel some surprise as we observe how much they run in opposite directions. With us the defence was based in the first instance on such arguments as the supposed predictions of Holy Writ, or the personal interest of the slave-dealers to study the good health and well-being of their slaves. By degrees these arguments were utterly refuted and overthrown. Then the advocates of the existing system, while acknowledging the general considerations against it to be irresistible, took their stand on what lawyers would have termed a dilatory plea. They contended, and certainly with great truth, that the question was no longer a plain and simple one, but had become interwoven with many practical considerations; that care must be taken of the interests which had grown up under a system which the law had sanctioned; and that even for the sake of the negroes themselves the great work of their Emancipation should be accomplished by slow degrees. In America the course of the discussion has been the very reverse. We may learn from such high authorities as the letters of Washington or the travels of Tocqueville that till within these thirty years the force of the general arguments against Slave Trade and Slavery was not denied, and that the planters of the south, with few exceptions, relied, as they justly might, on the particular grounds for caution and delay. But since that time there has been taken a large step in advance. Slavery is no longer excused as an existing evil rendered necessary by especial circumstances, and to endure only for a time, but is rather vindicated as a laudable and lasting 'institution.' Nay, there are even found some clergymen among them so keen and thorough-going as to say—and not only to say, but to preach—that Slavery as a permanent system is perfectly consistent with, or rather enjoined by, the leading principles of the Gospel.

Official changes and appointments—Treaties of Defensive Alliance with Holland and Prussia—Mental alienation of the King—Pitt's measures—Prince of Wales consults Lord Loughborough—Manifestation of national sympathy—Objects of Pitt and Thurlow—Meeting of Parliament—The King's removal to Kew—Fox's return from Italy.

THE Session of 1788, marked both by important measures and by eloquent debates, was closed on the 11th of July by a Speech from the Throne. Even before its close Mr. Pitt had been much intent on some official changes and new appointments. On the chief of these we find him write to his mother as follows:—

Downing Street, June 19, 1788.

My dear Mother,—You have been infinitely good, as usual, in making more allowance than could fairly be claimed for the calls of business as well as for some necessary intervals of idleness. I feel, however, really ashamed of having availed myself so long of the latitude you gave. Business is now fairly at an end in the House of Commons, and will probably finish in the House of Lords so as to admit of the Prorogation in the course of next week. The Session ends most satisfactorily, and its close will be accompanied by some events which add not a little to that satisfaction. I feel, indeed, no small pleasure in having to communicate a piece of news which will, I believe, fully make up for my long silence, and which you will be as happy in hearing as I am in telling. It is no other than this, that a new arrangement in the Admiralty is, from various circumstances, become unavoidable, that Lord Howe must be succeeded by a landsman, and that landsman is my brother. I have had some doubts whether the public may not think this too much like monopoly, but that doubt is not sufficient to counterbalance the personal comfort which will result from it and the general advantage to the whole of our system. You will, I am sure, be happy to hear that Lord Howe does not quit without a public mark of honour by a fresh step in the peerage, without which, I own, I should feel more regret than I can pretend to do now. Another event which you will not be sorry to learn is the conclusion of a very satisfactory alliance with Russia, which will probably lead to a very secure and permanent system of Continental politics. . . . .

I am going, the end of next week, if our arrangement is by that time completed, for a few days to Cambridge, and a fortnight or three weeks after will, I hope, bring me to Burton. Be so good as to let my news remain an entire secret, as it should not transpire till it takes effect.

Ever, my dear mother, &c., W. PITT.

The same appointment is thus referred to in a letter from Mr. Grenville to his brother in Ireland:

'Pitt's intention is to place his brother at the head of the Admiralty, giving him Sir Charles Middleton and Hood for assistants, and prevailing with Mulgrave, if possible, to accept the Comptrollership of the Navy. I have no doubt of this arrangement being in general very acceptable. The great popularity of Lord Chatham's manners and his near connexion with Pitt are, I think, sufficient to remove the impression of any objection in the public opinion from his being brought forward in the first instance in so responsible a situation. To those who know him there can be no doubt that his abilities are fully equal to the undertaking, arduous as it is; and to those who do not, Sir Charles Middleton's name and character will hold out a solution.'

The offer to Sir Charles Middleton was, it seems, declined; but Lord Hood was appointed a Lord of the Admiralty, under the Earl of Chatham as chief. Lord Hood was a distinguished Admiral, in 1782 created an Irish Peer. In May, 1784, he had been at the head of the poll for Westminster; but in August, 1788, on appealing to his constituents for re-election, he was defeated by Lord John Townshend, the numbers—after fifteen days' poll—being 6,392 against 5,569. It was a considerable triumph to the Opposition, and they extolled it as such.

The appointment of Lord Chatham himself, though in the first instance well received by the public, did not by any means fulfil the expectations it had raised. As First Lord of the Admiralty the brother of Pitt showed but little aptitude for business, and none at all for debate; and from his want of punctuality in his appointments he came to be often nicknamed 'the late Lord Chatham.'

In June, 1788, Lord Mansfield had at last retired from the Bench, and he survived in retirement till the year 1793 and till the great age of eighty-eight. He retired perhaps a little too late for his renown, considering the infirmities which for some time past had pressed upon him. 'Lord Mansfield is totally incapable of doing his duty, and is in great bodily pain.' So writes Lord Sydney in January, 1787. 'Lord Mansfield is at Bath, sleeps everywhere but in bed, receives his quarter's salary, and does not resign.' So writes General Grant in April the same year.[1]

Sir Lloyd Kenyon now became Chief Justice, with a peerage as Lord Kenyon. The office of Master of the Rolls, left vacant by this promotion, was designed by Pitt for his early friend Pepper Arden, now Attorney-General. But Lord Thurlow offered a fierce resistance.

[1] See the Cornwallis Correspondence, vol. i. p. 256 and 287.

He claimed the office of the Rolls as under his own gift, and for some time declared—no doubt with abundance of oaths—that he would sooner resign the Great Seal than put it to Arden's patent. But Pitt was resolute, and Thurlow at last, though still growling, gave way.

In due course, accordingly, Pepper Arden was appointed Master of the Rolls, and Macdonald, from Solicitor, Attorney-General. The vacant office of Solicitor-General was, to the high satisfaction of the Bar, conferred upon Scott, who had long since retrieved the discredit of his first abortive effort in the House of Commons. The King, on this occasion, laid down a rule which has ever since been observed, that the Attorney and Solicitor-General, as also the Judges, shall, if not 'Honourable' by birth, be always knighted.[1] His Majesty's object was to keep up the reputation of the Order of Knighthood, which at this time had greatly declined. Accordingly, Macdonald became Sir Archibald, and Scott Sir John. The latter, at least, was by no means well pleased. We find him write as follows to his brother Henry: 'I kissed the King's hand yesterday as Solicitor-General. The King, in spite of my teeth, laid his sword upon my shoulder and bade Sir John arise. At this last instance of his Royal favour I have been much disconcerted; but I cannot help myself, and so I sing—

> Oho the delight
> To be a gallant knight!

My wife is persecuted with her new title, and we laugh at her from morning till evening.'

But the Chancellor continued full of wrath. He was already incensed with the Prime Minister on two other grounds—the vote of Pitt for the impeachment of Hastings, and the motion of Pitt against the Slave Trade. Now the fresh point of office caused his resentment to boil over and to manifest itself without control. On the 12th of June we find the King, in writing to

[1] Lord Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors, vol. vii. p. 84.

Pitt, appeal to his 'good temper,' which His Majesty hoped would make him 'feel for weakness' in his colleague. Pitt having carried his point, did not desire to prosecute the quarrel; but there ceased to be any intimacy or even any intercourse, except of the most formal kind, between these brother Ministers.

The Treaty of Defensive Alliance with Holland being brought to a conclusion and signed in the course of this spring, Mr. Pitt proposed to the King to confer a peerage on its negotiator, Sir James Harris. His Majesty consented on condition that Sir Joseph Yorke, for many years previous his ambassador at the Hague, should, as an act of justice, receive the same distinction. Accordingly Sir James became Lord Malmesbury, and Sir Joseph Lord Dover.

The defensive alliance with Holland was speedily followed by another to the same effect with Prussia. Preliminary articles were signed at Loo on the 13th of June, and the treaty itself at Berlin on the 13th of August. The negotiator was Mr. Joseph Ewart, a man of considerable ability, selected by Pitt as Minister to the Court of Frederick William. Besides the customary articles of mutual guarantee, England and Prussia bound themselves to act at all times in concert for the purpose of maintaining the security and independence of the United Provinces. It was, therefore, in fact a triple defensive alliance.

Thus in only four years and a half of Mr. Pitt's administration had England been extricated from her single and defenceless state at the close of the last war. Then, besides her old claim on Portugal, she had remained without a single ally. Now if France were willing to remain at peace, there was a Treaty of Commerce to engage her in more friendly relations. If, on the other hand, France desired to renew her aggressive schemes on Holland or on any other power, we had acquired the Stadtholder as restored to his just authority, and also the King of Prussia, for allies.

In this summer, as in the last, Pitt had hoped to pay a visit to his friend at the Lakes. 'Pitt promises to steal down to me for a few days,' so writes Wilberforce at this time. But in this summer, as in the last, the pressure of business forbade it. The affairs of Sweden now began, as I shall show hereafter, to cause some solicitude and to require a vigilant control. Even the ultimate object of Pitt, a visit to Lady Chatham, could not be accomplished without much delay. Thus he writes:

Downing Street, August 29, 1788.

My dear Mother,—I have been every day, for I know not how long, hoping to be able to tell you the day when I should have the happiness of seeing you at Burton; but, as too often has happened, every day has brought some fresh incident to put it off. This week would, I believe, have pretty nearly enabled me to speak positively, but an accidental cold (which has no other inconvenience than a swelled face and the impossibility of going to St. James's) will oblige me to defer till next week the conclusion of business which I hoped to have got rid of this. The exact time, and the interval for which I can be at liberty, must at all events depend upon news from abroad, where so many things are going on, that although we have every reason to be certain that no consequences can arise otherwise than favourable to us, a good deal of watching is necessary. My hope was to have been able to make a pretty long stay at once whenever I reach Burton; but even if that should not be the case, I can do it at twice, and I am pretty sure of a good deal of leisure in the course of the interval before Parliament meets.

To-day brings no news from Paris of a fresh change. The Archbishop has resigned, and Necker is made Minister of Finance, which is probably the best thing that could happen for that country, and in the manner of it very glorious for him; but he will have no easy task to go through with.

I think my brother is now really at the eve of being able to move again. I shall probably see him established at Wimbledon before I leave this neighbourhood, and with no other confinement but that of business, which will be a luxury after the other. My kindest love to Eliot, and most affectionate compliments to Mrs. Stapleton, not forgetting good Mrs. Sparry. Ever, my dear Mother, &c.,

W. Pitt.

Early next month, however, the visit to Somersetshire was duly made, and Pitt returned from it fully expecting to divide the remainder of a long Recess between Downing Street and Holwood.

Nescia mens hominum fati sortisque futuræ.

Never was any Prime Minister of England deemed more secure or solidly established than Mr. Pitt in the autumn of 1788. Never did the political horizon seem more clear, more bright, more wholly free from clouds. The members of the Opposition could only look on office as a fond remembrance, and in the future as a distant dream; and their chief, Mr. Fox, despairing of all present effect in England, set out with his mistress, Mrs. Armistead, for a tour in Italy. Yet at this very period was impending an event wholly without parallel in our Constitutional history, which appeared as an utter blight to the exaltation of Pitt, and as placing Fox within view, nay, almost within grasp, of the highest power. That event, so wholly unforeseen, was the mental alienation of the King.

The constitution of George the Third was by nature hardy and robust, but with a constant tendency to corpulence. To counteract this the King had from an early period adopted a system of abstemious diet and of active exercise. While his meals were of the simplest and plainest kind, the Equerries in attendance upon him might often complain of the great distances which he rode in hunting, or of his walks of three hours before breakfast. That system carried to excess, combined with never failing and anxious attention to affairs of State, was the cause of the mental malady in 1788. Such at least was the opinion of the case expressed by Dr. Willis, the ablest by far of his physicians, when examined by the Committees of the House of Lords and House of Commons.

Early in the summer of 1788 the King's health suffered from repeated bilious attacks. In a letter to Mr. Pitt he says of himself that he is certainly 'a cup too low.' His physicians prescribed the waters of Cheltenham, and on the 12th of July, the day after the Prorogation, he set out with the Queen for that place. A sojourn of several weeks failed, however, to yield him the expected benefit. When he returned, first to Kew, and afterwards to Windsor, he seemed weaker in body than before. His attendants were surprised and grieved at seeing him, so lately the most athletic of pedestrians, require the support of a stick. 'I could not,' he said, 'get on without it: my strength seems diminishing hourly.' 'My dear Effy'—thus he accosted one of the Queen's ladies, the Dowager Countess of Effingham—'you see me all at once an old man!'[1]

Yet still in some points, at least, the King's active habits were maintained. Mr. Rose reports that 'Mr. Pitt saw him at Kew, and was with him three hours and forty minutes, both on their legs the whole time.'[2] And this brings us to a peculiarity in the reign of George the Third. It was the invariable, or almost invariable, custom of that Monarch to confer with his Ministers standing, neither himself to sit down nor ask them to be seated. This rule, so highly inconvenient to both parties, was no doubt derived from some of the Continental Courts.

At this period of October, 1788, the only physician in attendance on the King was Sir George Baker. He states in his evidence before the subsequent Committees that the first time when he conceived any suspicion of a mental malady in the King was in the evening of the 22nd of October. Next morning the unfavourable symptoms which led to that suspicion had wholly disappeared.

On the 24th, however, the King made an effort beyond his strength in going to hold a Levee at St. James's. He made that effort, as he wrote to Mr. Pitt, 'to stop further lies and any fall of the Stocks.' But at the Levee his manner and conversation were such as to cause the most painful uneasiness in several at least of those to whom he spoke. Mr. Pitt, in particular, could not entirely suppress his emotion when he attended the King in his closet after the Levee, which His Majesty observed and noticed with kindness in writing next day to his Minister from Kew. Probably conscious himself, at least in some degree, of his coming malady, he directed Mr. Pitt in the same letter not to allow any political papers to be sent to him before the next ensuing Levee.

On the 25th the King removed to Windsor Castle. His state appears to have fluctuated from day to day, but there was no lasting improvement in his health. His letters to Mr. Pitt, which I shall give at length in my appendix, bear no tokens of an incoherent mind. They merely manifest some reluctance and anxiety as to the measures which Pitt desired to pursue with regard to the Northern Powers. The last letter of the King before his malady is dated on the 3rd of November. In this His Majesty states that he can now sign warrants in any number without inconvenience. He adds that he attempts reading the despatches daily, but as yet without success.

Of the King's real condition at this time by far the best, and indeed, so far as published, the only good account is to be found in the private journal of Miss Frances Burney, the accomplished author of 'Evelina.' That lady was now a member of the Royal Household, and in daily attendance on the Queen as, under Mrs. Schwellenberg, Deputy Keeper of the Robes. Dull and trifling as the earlier volumes of her 'Diary,' I must confess, appear to me, the entries in it now become of lively interest and of sterling value, and are marked by not merely dutiful but warm and affectionate attachment to her Royal Mistress.

By some extracts from her journal my narrative may be best continued:

Sunday, November 3.—We are all here in a most uneasy state. The King is better and worse so frequently, and changes so daily backward and forward, that everything is to be apprehended if his nerves are not some way quieted. I dreadfully fear he is on the eve of some severe fever. The Queen is almost overpowered with some secret terror. I am affected beyond all expression in her presence to see what struggles she makes to support serenity. To-day she gave up the conflict when I was alone with her, and burst into a violent fit of tears. It was very, very terrible to see!

Wednesday, November 5.—I found my poor Royal Mistress in the morning sad and sadder still; something horrible seemed impending; and I saw her whole resource was in religion. We had talked lately much upon solemn subjects; and she appeared already preparing herself to be resigned for whatever might happen.

At noon the King went out in his chaise with the Princess Royal for an airing. I looked from my window to see him; he was all smiling benignity, but gave so many orders to the postilions, and got in and out of the carriage twice with such agitation, that again my fear of a great fever hanging over him grew more and more powerful. Alas! how little did I imagine I should see him no more for so long—so black a period!

When I went to my poor Queen, I found her spirits still worse and worse. . . . . The Princess Royal soon returned. She came in cheerfully, and gave in German a history of the airing, and one that seemed comforting.

Soon after suddenly arrived the Prince of Wales. He came into the room. He had just quitted Brighthelmstone. Something passing within seemed to render this meeting awfully distant on both sides. She asked if he should not return to Brighthelmstone. He answered, 'Yes; the next day.' He desired to speak with her: they retired together.

This day, the 5th of November, of which Miss Burney has thus described the earlier portion, proved to be the crisis of the King's disorder, when its real nature could be no longer mistaken or concealed. For that afternoon the King, at dinner with the Royal Family, broke forth into positive delirium; and the Queen was so overpowered as to fall into violent hysterics.

Next morning, the 6th, when Miss Burney rose, she found that the equerries and gentlemen in attendance had sat up next his chamber door all night, and there were likewise all the pages dispersed in the passages and ante-rooms; 'and oh,' she adds, 'what horror in every face I met.'

Besides Sir George Baker, who continued in close attendance, a physician of the highest eminence—Dr. Warren—had been sent for by express. When, however, he came, the King positively refused to see him. 'This was terrible,' writes Miss Burney. 'But the King was never so despotic; no one dared oppose him. He would not listen to a word, though when unopposed he was still all gentleness and benignity to every one around him. . . . He kept talking unceasingly; although his voice was so lost in hoarseness and weakness it was rendered almost inarticulate.'

Expresses had of course gone up also to Mr. Pitt. His grief may be easily imagined. But his anxiety was not less than his grief. He saw at once the difficulties that rose before him in the event that the King's reason should continue clouded and yet his life be spared. In such a case there were strong grounds for imposing some restrictions on a Regency. Yet how could such restrictions be imposed unless by Act of Parliament, and how could any Act of Parliament be passed without a King to give it his assent? Thus in one sense a limited Regency seemed requisite, while in another sense it seemed impossible.

Pitt, however, applied himself at once to all the measures in his power. That same afternoon he sent expresses to summon the Cabinet Ministers who were absent from town. Here is his letter to the Marquis of Stafford, Lord Privy Seal:

Grosvenor Square, Nov. 6, 1788, 6 P.M.

My dear Lord,—I write from Lord Carmarthen's, having just had an account from Windsor, by which I learn that the King's disorder, which has for some days given us much uneasiness, has within a few hours taken so serious a turn that I think myself obliged to lose no time in apprising your Lordship of it.

The accounts are sent under considerable alarm, and therefore do not state the symptoms very precisely; but from what I learn, there is too much reason to fear that they proceed from a fever which has settled on the brain, and which may produce immediate danger to His Majesty's life. You will easily conceive the pain I suffer in being obliged to send your Lordship this intelligence; but as you may possibly think it right, under such circumstances, to be on the spot as soon as possible, I thought no time should be lost in letting you know the situation.

I am, with great regard, &c., W. PITT.

On the same day Pitt also wrote to the Bishop of Lincoln at Buckden Palace, and here is the extract from his letter which the Bishop gives:

The effect most to be dreaded is on the understanding. If this lasts beyond a certain time, it will produce the most difficult and delicate crisis imaginable, in making provision for the Government to go on. It must, however, be yet some weeks before that can require decision; but the interval will be a truly anxious one. You shall hear again soon; but if in the course of a few days you could spare the time to come to town, I should be very glad to talk with you, as there will be a thousand particulars you must wish to know, which I cannot write. I shall not stir from hence, except for going to inquire at Windsor.

The Bishop adds:

I went to town immediately, and late at night found Mr. Pitt expecting a messenger every moment with the account of the King's death; but the intelligence, which did not arrive till two in the morning, proved more favourable.

During the night which followed there were many anxious watchers in the apartment next to the Royal sufferer's. The Prince of Wales, the Duke of York, the physicians, and the gentlemen of the Royal Household, sat on chairs and lay on sofas round the room. All were in dead silence, and amidst the partial darkness the two Princes were still to be distinguished by their stars.

Next day, the 7th of November, towards seven in the morning, when the Queen was already dressed, but Miss Burney was still attending her, the Prince of Wales came hastily into Her Majesty's chamber, and then, in Miss Burney's presence, gave 'a very energetic history' of the preceding night. The King had risen some hours before daylight, and insisted on walking into the next apartment. There he was utterly amazed at finding, instead of the mere solitude which he expected, the large assemblage of his family and household. With some haste he demanded what they all did there. Sir George Baker was exhorted in whispers by the gentlemen near him, and even, as it would seem, by the Prince of Wales, to lead the King back to his chamber; but he had not courage, and he seems indeed to have well deserved the character which the King presently gave him when His Majesty penned him in a corner and told him he was only an old woman. No one else dared approach His Majesty, and this most painful scene continued a considerable time. At length the Queen's Vice-Chamberlain, Colonel Stephen Digby, an old servant of their Majesties, resolved to act. He went boldly up, and taking the King by the arm, entreated him to go to bed; but finding entreaties in vain, began to draw His Majesty along, and to say he must go. 'I will not,' cried the King, 'I will not! Who are you?' 'I am Colonel Digby, Sir,' he answered, 'and your Majesty has been very good to me, and now I am going to be very good to you; for you must come to bed, Sir—it is necessary to your life.' And then, continued the Prince of Wales in his narrative, the King was so surprised that he allowed himself to be drawn along as gently as a child, and thus was he brought back to his chamber.

Here, then, was the turning point. This was the precise moment when ceased the dominion of a Sovereign over his subjects, and when began, on the contrary, the dominion of sound minds over an unsound one. Here, then, let History pause. So long as the King continued a public character, it is her right and her duty to record his course; not so to explore the dismal secrets of his enforced and lonely sick room.

It may, therefore, suffice to say in general terms that during the next few days the King became greatly worse both in mind and body. Not only seemed his reason lost, but his life in imminent danger. Then, in those hours of suspense and anguish at Windsor, came to light some further revelations of his growing malady. The Queen had sent for Dr. Warren soon after his first arrival, and felt it her duty to inform him privately that for some time past she had more than suspected the real situation of the King. The Duke of York had met the King on Monday the 3rd, after His Majesty had been on horseback for some hours, and the King, drawing his son aside, had burst into tears and given utterance to the simple but most affecting words, 'I wish to God I might die, for I am going to be mad!'[1]

The physicians in daily attendance—and within a fortnight their number had been increased to four—were of course guarded and cautious in their expressed opinions. But among the members of the Royal Household the belief was most strongly prevalent that there was little or no prospect of the King's recovery. The Queen withdrew to her own chamber, and passed the whole day in patient sorrow with her daughters. The entire direction of the household devolved upon the

[1] See the private letters from Captain Payne to Mr. Sheridan, as published in Moore's Life of the latter (vol. ii. p. 21-31). Payne was at this time attending the Prince of Wales at Windsor.

Prince of Wales, and nothing at Windsor was done but by direction of His Royal Highness.

So great and awful an affliction, and so deep a responsibility resulting from it, could not fail to impress even the least earnest minds.

'The Prince was frightened, and was blooded yesterday.' So writes one of the Grenville cousins who was at Windsor on the 7th.

The first step of the Prince when called upon to take the command at Windsor was to send the Duke of York with a message to Lord Loughborough. The Prince said that he should anxiously await the return of Fox from Italy—that meanwhile he should look mainly to Lord Loughborough for counsel—and that Lord Loughborough ought at once to turn over in his mind what steps in so unprecedented an emergency it might be best for the Prince to take. Lord Loughborough might well consider his darling object of ambition, the Great Seal, as close in view before him.

Meanwhile the illness of the King and its real nature could not be kept secret. The tidings of it flew far and wide throughout the country, everywhere exciting the utmost sympathy and sorrow. Then did it become apparent how strong and deeply rooted was in truth at this period the popularity of George the Third, and how thoroughly had passed away from it the clouds of earlier years. By the Queen's direction Colonel Digby had written to the Archbishop of Canterbury, suggesting that there should be offered up public prayers for the King's recovery. A form of prayer was accordingly framed at Lambeth Palace and ordered to be used in all the churches, and the manner in which the various congregations through the kingdom joined in this act of worship clearly evinced the sincerity and the strength of their affliction.

Other manifestations of the same feeling were not all as commendable. Thus the physicians in attendance on the King received every day a number of threatening letters to answer for the safety of their Monarch with their lives. On one occasion Sir George Baker was stopped in his carriage by the mob, and required to give an account of the King's state. Poor Sir George faltered out that it was a bad one; on which there arose a furious cry: 'The more shame for you!'

At this crisis the two Ministers on whom most depended were Pitt and Thurlow. But they had little intercourse, and their objects were far asunder. Pitt was thinking how best he could serve his country—Thurlow was thinking how best he could keep his place. So early as the 7th the Prince of Wales summoned to his presence the Chancellor, who went down and remained that night at Windsor. The Prince's object was a very proper one—to consult with him as to the care and safe custody of the King's jewels and private papers. On coming back to town on the morning of the 8th, the Chancellor only sent a note to Pitt, stating that the Prince desired to see him at Windsor the next morning at eleven. Pitt went to call upon his colleague, but does not seem to have obtained much further information. He learnt, however, that the immediate business for which His Royal Highness had summoned him was to inquire about a paper which the Queen imagined that the King had put into Pitt's hand respecting an arrangement for the younger Princes and Princesses. But this was a misapprehension, for Pitt had no such paper.

Pitt of course obeyed the Prince's summons. The result is related as follows by Mr. Grenville in a letter the next morning: 'I need not tell you the effect which this dreadful calamity produces. Pitt had yesterday a long conference with the Prince, but it turned chiefly on the situation of the King, and the state and progress of his disorder. Nothing passed from which any conclusion can be drawn as to future measures. He treated him with civility, but nothing more. The general idea is that they mean to try a negotiation. But whether the Prince means that, and whether Pitt ought in any case to listen to it at all, or in what degree, are questions which it is difficult indeed to decide.'[1]

The part of Pitt was promptly taken. It was, as his part was ever, straightforward and direct. He would listen to no terms for himself. He would consider only his bounden duty to his afflicted King. He would, by the authority of Parliament, impose some restrictions on the Regency for a limited time, so that the Sovereign might resume his power without difficulty in case his reason were restored. What might be the just limits or the necessary period of such restrictions he had not yet decided, and was still revolving in his mind. But he had never the least idea, as his opponents feared, of a Council of Regency which might impede the Prince in the choice of a new administration. On the contrary, Pitt looked forward to his own immediate dismissal from the public service, and he had determined to return to the practice of his profession at the Bar.

Far different was the course of Thurlow. Under an appearance of rugged honesty he concealed no small amount of selfish craft. He was ready to grasp at an overture, and it was not long ere an overture came. Two gentlemen in the Prince's confidence—the Comptroller of his Household, Captain Payne, more commonly called Jack Payne, and Richard Brinsley Sheridan—had set their heads together. Was it not to be feared that Pitt would attempt to fetter the coming Regency with some restrictions? And by whom could that attempt be more effectually prevented than by the statesman holding the Great Seal? How important then if possible to gain him over!

With these views, and with the Prince's sanction, a secret negotiation with Lord Thurlow was begun. It was proposed to him that he should do his utmost to defeat any restrictions on the Regent, and that in return he should become President of the Council in the new administration. But the offer of the Presidency was spurned by Thurlow; he insisted on still retaining the Great Seal. This was a more difficult matter, from the engagements of the Prince, and indeed of the whole Fox party, to Lord Loughborough. Sheridan, however, strongly pressed that Lord Thurlow should be secured upon his own terms. The Prince agreed, and the negotiation was continued without Lord Loughborough. The bargain was struck, or all but struck, awaiting only Fox's sanction when he should arrive from Italy.

The perfidy of Thurlow in this transaction stands little in need of comment. To this day it forms the main blot upon his fame. Nowhere in our recent annals shall we readily find any adequate parallel to it, except indeed in the career of his contemporary and his rival, Loughborough.

Lord Thurlow succeeded at first in concealing all knowledge of the scheme from Pitt. In this he was much assisted by the fact that from this time forward the Cabinet Councils were frequently held at Windsor, thus affording him good opportunities for slipping round in secret to the apartments of the Prince of Wales. But a very slight incident brought to light the mystery. His cabals were detected by his own hat. Thus used the story to be told by a late survivor from these times, my lamented friend Mr. Thomas Grenville. One day when a Council was to be held at Windsor, Thurlow had been there some time before any of his colleagues arrived. He was to be brought back to London in the carriage of one of them, and the moment of departure being come, the Chancellor's hat was nowhere to be found. After long search one of the pages came running up with the hat in his hand, and saying aloud, 'My Lord, I found it in the closet of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.' The other Ministers were still in the hall waiting for their carriages, and the evident confusion of Lord Thurlow corroborated the inference which they drew.[1]

Thus might Pitt suspect, or much more than suspect, the Chancellor's double dealings. But still he had no positive proof of them ; and he might feel as the younger Agrippina, that in many cases the best defence against treachery is to seem unconscious of it.[2] Thus, maintaining his usual lofty calmness, he forbore from all inquiry, all expostulation. He continued to meet Lord Thurlow as before, but he privately determined to place no part of the Regency business in Lord Thurlow's hands, and to entrust to Lord Camden the conduct in the House of Lords of all the measures consequent on the Royal illness.

It was no slight aggravation to the embarrassment of Mr. Pitt at this juncture that he was bound to meet Parliament without delay. Parliament had only been prorogued till the 20th of November, and there remained no legal power in the State to prorogue it further. The two Houses met therefore on the 20th as a matter of course, when Pitt in the Commons, and Thurlow in the Lords, announced the King's incapacity for business as the cause of meeting. Pitt deprecated any present discussion, suggesting that the House should adjourn till the 4th of December, when he said if the King's disorder should unhappily continue, it would be necessary to consider what measures ought to be adopted. Meanwhile, to give their proceedings all possible solemnity, he further proposed that the Speaker should write circular letters to every Member, requiring his attendance on the appointed day. Lord Camden made a similar proposition in the Lords, and these motions passed both Houses without a single observation from any side. Mr. Fox had not yet returned, and during his absence the Opposition were unwilling to commit themselves by comments of any kind.

Soon afterwards a case of much difficulty arose at Windsor. There was a strong and just desire to remove His Majesty to Kew. In the first place the distance of Windsor from London was most inconvenient to the physicians in attendance; secondly, and this was the main if not the only reason put forward by themselves, it was most essential that the King should have, as he might have at Kew and could not at Windsor, a private garden, where, whenever his health permitted, he might take exercise without being overlooked or observed. But, on the other hand, the King showed the most extreme repugnance to leave Windsor. It was thought that even in his distracted state the advice of his confidential servants would have weight with him, and the necessity of compulsion be thus avoided. Accordingly on the 28th a Privy Council was held at Windsor, when the physicians were formally examined, all agreeing that the removal of His Majesty to Kew was a point of most pressing importance.

For the scene that followed, as for some of the preceding, I adopt the graphic description of Miss Burney: 'Inexpressible was the alarm of every one lest the King, if he recovered, should bear a lasting resentment against the authors and promoters of this journey. To give it therefore every possible sanction, it was decreed that he should be seen both by the Chancellor and Mr. Pitt. The Chancellor went into his presence with a tremor such as before he had been only accustomed to inspire, and when he came out he was so extremely affected by the state in which he saw his Royal Master and patron that the tears ran down his cheeks, and his feet had difficulty to support him. Mr. Pitt was more composed, but expressed his grief with so much respect and attachment, that it added new weight to the universal admiration with which he is here beheld.'

But whatever may have passed at these most painful interviews, it was found that they had not surmounted the morbid aversion of the King to the change required. 'In what a situation was the house!' exclaims Miss Burney: 'Princes, Equerries, Physicians, Pages,—all conferring, whispering, plotting, and caballing how to induce the King to set off!' Recourse was now had to a no less painful stratagem. The King had for some time been most earnestly pressing to see the Queen and the Princesses, but this the physicians had deemed it necessary to refuse him. It was then decided that the Royal ladies should proceed early next morning to Kew; that the King should be informed of their departure by the physicians; and that if, as they expected, he should doubt their assertion, he might be suffered to go through the apartments and ascertain the fact for himself. Next a promise was to be made His Majesty that on rejoining the members of his family at Kew he should be permitted to see them. On this promise George the Third did consent to the journey, and it did take place. But on coming to Kew the promise under which he had acted was not fulfilled; and the result—as might surely have been foreseen—was that same night a paroxysm of much increased severity.

Meanwhile an express had been sent to Fox in Italy with the tidings of the Royal illness, and with a pressing summons for his immediate return. The messenger found the travelling statesman at Bologna, on his way to Rome. He forthwith set out on his journey homewards, and proceeded with so much expedition as even in that wintry season to perform a journey of more than eight hundred miles in nine days. So great, indeed, was the despatch he used and so rough the roads over which he travelled, that he severely suffered in his health for some time after his return. With all his diligence, however, he could not arrive in England until the 24th of this month. It is striking to compare these details with another unlooked for summons and another rapid return from Italy—I mean Sir Robert Peel's, in November 1835. Each of these statesmen came back with the expectation of being made Prime Minister, but the hope proved as fleeting in the one case as did the hold of office in the other.

No sooner was Fox in London than he was apprised of the negotiation with Lord Thurlow. Fox had no taste at all for this underhand intrigue. But he felt himself bound by the Prince's word which had already passed. His own feelings of distress are best evinced by some expressions in a note to Sheridan: 'I have swallowed the pill—a most bitter one it was—and have written to Lord Loughborough, whose answer of course must be consent. What is to be done next? Should the Prince himself, you or I, or Warren, be the person to speak to the Chancellor? Pray tell me what is to be done. I do not remember ever feeling so uneasy about any political thing I ever did in my life. Call if you can.'

Besides this one 'political thing,' another of still higher public moment was now submitted to Fox. Lord Loughborough had been devising a bold scheme, for, in fact, a Coup d'Etat. He had suggested that the Prince of Wales might, as next heir, seize the Regency by his own act, and without any authority from Parliament. This scheme he had embodied in a note which is written with his own hand in pencil. It still remains among the Rosslyn Papers, and it has been published by Lord Campbell in his 'Lives of the Chancellors.' [1]

But the sturdy hand of Fox brushed this cobweb aside. He was prepared, as we shall presently see, to go great lengths in asserting the inherent prerogative of the Prince of Wales. But he never dreamt of dispensing with the votes of Parliament. Under such circumstances, Lord Loughborough of course yielded to his leader; and with his pencil note safely locked up within his desk, his Lordship a few weeks later, when speaking in the House of Peers, thought himself justified in solemnly disclaiming or denying that he held the unconstitutional doctrine which that note expressed. —Were not Loughborough and Thurlow worthy rivals?

It appears however from some Reminiscences which Lord Carmarthen the Secretary of State drew up, and subsequently as Duke of Leeds read to a young friend, that the Ministers of 1788 had soon become apprised of Lord Loughborough's perilous project. Had he persisted in it, they had designed to arrest him for High Treason and send him to the Tower.[1]

On the 3rd of December, the day before the re-assembling of Parliament, a Privy Council was held at Whitehall. By Pitt's direction a summons had been addressed to every Member, of whatever politics, the object being to impart in the most authentic form accurate intelligence on the situation of the King. Of 54 Members who came accordingly, it was calculated at the time that 24 were from the Opposition side. The five physicians who had been attending His Majesty being called in and examined upon oath, deposed as to his present incapacity for business. They added that there was a fair prospect of his recovery, but that they were wholly unable to fix or foretell the time. They had known cases of this kind last only for six weeks—they had known them last as long as two years.

Such then was the position of affairs when on the 4th of December Parliament met for business, and when the two great party rivals were again in presence of each other.

Meeting of Parliament—Report from the Privy Council—Dr. Francis Willis—Physicians examined by Parliamentary Committees—Pitt proposes a Committee to search for precedents—Fox's objections—Committee appointed—Intrigues of Thurlow—Pitt's Resolutions—Free gift of 100,000*l.* offered to Pitt, but declined—Pitt's Regency plan—Grenville elected Speaker—Report of new Committee to examine the physicians—Pitt's Resolutions restricting the Regency—Sallies of Burke—Regency Bill passed the Commons—Restoration of the King to health.

On the 4th of December the Parliament met in most anxious expectation. Mr. Pitt in the one House and Lord Camden in the other laid upon the Table the Report of the Examinations before the Privy Council, and moved that it should be taken into consideration on the 8th. At the same time the Prime Minister gave notice that he should propose the appointment of a Committee to search for precedents. Mr. Fox suggested a doubt (as Mr. Vyner had before him) whether it was quite consistent with the dignity of Parliament to make a Report from the Privy Council the groundwork of their proceedings on a question of such extreme importance. Pitt declared that he was anxious to afford the most ample information, but pointed out that the Privy Council could take evidence upon oath, which a Committee of the Commons could not.

Meanwhile it had become apparent to the small circle of the King's confidential servants, that, eminent as were the physicians in attendance, they had up to this time altogether failed in effecting any mitigation of his symptoms. Might not greater benefit follow from the treatment of some one who had more specially applied himself to the cure of mental maladies? Foremost among such practitioners in public fame stood Dr. Francis Willis, a clergyman and Rector of Wapping.

By a somewhat unusual combination of duties he had during twenty-eight years kept an asylum for insane persons at his residence in Lincolnshire. His name was first brought forward by Mrs. Harcourt, the wife of one of the Equerries, General afterwards Earl Harcourt. She drew up a paper stating her knowledge of his merit from his successful treatment of her mother. On the 28th of November this paper being laid before the Prince, the Duke of York, the Chancellor, and Pitt, it was determined that Willis should be sent for.[1] Accordingly he was summoned by express to Kew. He came accompanied by his two sons, one of whom, Dr. John Willis, was a professed physician; and on the 5th of December he had his first interview with the Royal sufferer.

From the first, Dr. Willis formed a highly favourable opinion of the case. 'Had I been consulted in the first instance,' he frankly said, 'His Majesty's illness would have been of very short duration.' He adopted at once a different course of treatment. He laid aside all false pretences, all petty vexations, all unnecessary restraints. He thought that in this case no violence need be apprehended, and that no suspicion should be shown. The King had been denied a razor at his toilet, and a knife and fork at his table. These were at once restored to him, and in Dr. Willis's presence were freely used. The good effects of this altered treatment speedily appeared. As yet the delusions continued unabated, but far greater calmness and composure, as also better health, were attained.

Under these circumstances both the Queen and Mr. Pitt were disposed to place great confidence in Dr. Willis. He was considered as mainly responsible for the conduct of the case. Taking up his residence with his sons in the palace at Kew, he had the constant care of the King's person, while the other physicians only paid their visits by rotation and at stated times.

[1] Diary of Mrs. Harcourt, as cited by Mr. Massey in his History of England, vol. iii. pp. 376 and 386.

On the 8th, at the next meeting of the House, Pitt adverted to the suggestion which had been made of appointing a Parliamentary Committee to examine the physicians, and declared himself willing to accede to it, observing that there was now a stronger reason for it than at the last debate, since some new physicians had been recently called in. Accordingly there was named, with general assent, a Committee of twenty-one, comprising the most distinguished Members from both sides. A similar motion was made and carried in the Lords, and each Committee completed its examinations in a single day. All the physicians, in their evidence, agreed that there were good hopes of the King's recovery, but that no probable period for it could be named. Yet the degree of these hopes was not the same in all, and here again party spirit crept in. Dr. Warren was closely connected with Fox and Fox's friends, and it was observed that his prognostics were far less sanguine than those of Dr. Willis. Thus the names of these two physicians became, as it were, watchwords on each side; the Ministerial party relying on the special experience of Willis, while the Opposition party might allege the high authority of Warren.

On the 10th of December Mr. Pitt presented to the House the Report of these examinations, and observed that the King's present incapacity for business having now been ascertained by a Committee of their own Members, he should proceed according to his notice, and move that another Committee be appointed to search for precedents. But at this point commenced the tug of war. Fox rose and objected to the proposed Committee, although he said he should not resist it. In effect he said, though not in intention, that Committee would be an utter waste of time. It was perfectly well known that there existed no precedent whatever which could bear upon the present case. But there was then a person in the kingdom different from any other person to whom existing precedents could refer—an Heir Apparent of full age, and capacity to exercise the Royal power. In his (Mr. Fox's) firm opinion His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales had as clear, as express a right to assume the reins of Government, and exercise the powers of Sovereignty, during the illness and incapacity of the King, as in the case of His Majesty's natural demise. Such was his right, but His Royal Highness was not himself to judge when he was entitled to exercise it. The two Houses of Parliament, as the organs of the nation, were alone entitled to pronounce when the Prince ought to take possession of and exercise his right.

The views of Mr. Fox upon this question, as he thus unfolded them, seemed in striking contrast with the general tenor of his 'Revolution politics.' Here he was denying the supreme authority of the two Houses to deal as they thought fit with the eclipse of the Kingly power. He was asserting an inherent, and as it were Divine, right in the Prince of Wales. Thus he seemed to be treading in the footsteps of Filmer and Sancroft rather than of Somers and Burnet. Pitt, as he intently listened to Fox's enunciation of his principles, could scarcely, it is said, conceal his triumph at the indiscreet position which his rival had assumed. No sooner had the sentence which first announced it been concluded than Pitt, slapping his thigh triumphantly, turned round to the friend next him on the Treasury Bench, and whispered, 'I'll unwhig the gentleman for the rest of his life'![1] He started up as soon as Fox sat down. The doctrine, he said, which the House had just heard was of itself, if any additional ground were necessary, the strongest and most unanswerable reason for appointing the Committee that he had proposed. If a claim of right was intimated, even though not formally, on the part of the Prince of Wales to assume the government, it became of the utmost consequence to ascertain from precedent and history whether there was any foundation for this claim, which, if established, must preclude the House from the possibility of all deliberation on the subject. In the mean time he must maintain, that to assert such a right in the Prince of Wales or any one else, independent of the decision of the two Houses, was little less than treason to the Constitution of the country. Unless by their decision, the Prince of Wales had no more right—speaking of strict right—to assume the government than any other individual subject of the realm. What Parliament ought to determine on this point was a question of discretion ; and however strong the arguments might be on that ground in favour of the Prince of Wales, into which he would not enter at present, it did not affect the question of right.

Thus the gauntlet was fairly and on both sides cast down. The doctrine of Fox seemed to be received with much disfavour by the House, and Burke rose with generous warmth to support his friend ; but he showed in this debate, as in several others on this Regency question, an intemperance and ill taste that were much deplored by his party at that period, as they must be to this day by all true admirers of his fame. Thus he went so far as to call Pitt 'one of the Prince's competitors,' and in another part of his speech he described him as 'the Prince opposite.' For the first of these expressions Burke was called to Order; for both he was rebuked by Pitt in his reply. 'I appeal to the House,' said the Minister, 'upon the decency of such a charge. At that period of our history, when our Constitution was settled on its present foundations, and when Mr. Somers and other great men declared that no person had a right to the Crown independent of the consent of the two Houses, would it have been thought either fair or decent for any Member of either House to have pronounced Mr. Somers a personal competitor of King William the Third?'

Thus appointed without a division, the Committee completed its business in a single sitting, and produced good store of precedents, though of limited application and of slight Constitutional value. The discussion on Fox's doctrine was renewed in divers forms and on several days, but the doctrine itself gained no ground in the House, and it excited great alarm throughout the country. The privilege claimed for the Heir Apparent was commonly regarded as both an invasion of popular rights and a dethronement, as it were, of the afflicted King. Fox found it necessary to explain, in the clearest terms, that he had spoken only of himself, without the authority of any person whatever, much less from the authority of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales; but yet the ill impression was by no means removed.

A lively comment on these debates may be gathered from the confidential correspondence of William Grenville:—'Only think of Fox's want of judgment to bring himself and his friends into such a scrape as he has done, by maintaining a doctrine of higher Tory principle than could have been found anywhere since Sir Robert Sawyer's speeches! . . . . Fox found that by what he had said before, he had offended so many people, that he was obliged to take the very first moment of explaining it away. After this recantation was over, the day was closed by such a blunder of Sheridan's as I never knew any man of the meanest talent guilty of before. During the whole time that I have sat in Parliament—a pretty warm time—I never remember such an uproar as was raised by his threatening us with "the danger of provoking the Prince to assert his right," which were the exact words he used. You may conceive what advantage all this gives us, especially when coupled with the strong hopes entertained of the King's recovery.'[1]

In the Lords a motion for a similar Committee of

[1] Letters to Lord Buckingham, Dec. 11 and 13, 1788, as published in the Courts and Cabinets of George III.

Precedents was made on the 11th of December. Then the views which Fox had put forth the day before were controverted by Lord Camden and defended by Lord Loughborough. The Chancellor delivered himself of a temporising speech, as though not yet fixed in his opinion. But he began to fear that he might be a loser instead of gainer by his projected act of treachery. The reports of Dr. Willis were in due course submitted to him. He might observe that day by day they expressed a confident hope of the King's recovery. He might observe that on the 13th the Queen and the Princesses, whom the King had not seen since the 5th of the last month, were brought into his presence without danger. He seized Her Majesty's hand, kissed it, and held it in his during the whole interview, which lasted half an hour. The little Princess Amelia, who from her infancy had been his favourite child, sat upon his lap.[1]

The Chancellor felt that he could temporise no longer without great risk to his own position. With the new hopes of the King's recovery which Dr. Willis gave, he determined to take a bolder course on the next occasion in the House of Lords. That next occasion came on the 15th of December. Then the Duke of York made a good and sensible speech (his first in Parliament), disavowing most expressly in his brother's name any claim not derived from the will of the people. The Chancellor upon this left the Woolsack and addressed the House. He began by expressing his great satisfaction that no claim of right was to be raised by the Prince of Wales. But as he next proceeded to the afflicted condition of the King, his emotion seemed to grow uncontrollable, his voice faltered, and he burst into a flood of tears. Recovering himself, he declared his fixed and unalterable resolution to stand by a Sovereign who, during a reign of twenty-seven years, had proved his sacred regard to the principles which seated his family upon the Throne. Their first duty, he said, was to preserve the rights of that Sovereign entire, so that, when God should permit him to recover, he might not find himself in a worse situation than before his illness. The Chancellor dwelt on his own feelings of grief and gratitude, and wrought himself up at last to these celebrated words: 'and when I forget my King, may my God forget me!'

It seems scarcely possible to exaggerate the strong impression which this half sentence made. Within the House itself the effect was not perhaps so satisfactory. Wilkes, who was standing under the Throne, eyed the Chancellor askance, and muttered, 'God forget you! He will see you d—— first!' Burke at the same moment exclaimed, with equal wit and with no profaneness, 'The best thing that can happen to you!' Pitt also was on the steps of the Throne. On Lord Thurlow's imprecation he is said to have rushed out of the House, exclaiming several times, 'Oh, what a rascal!'[1]

But in the country at large the intrigues of Thurlow were not known: they were not even suspected. He was looked upon as the fearless assertor of his Sovereign's rights—as a strictly honest man, prepared, if need should be, to suffer for his honesty; and the impressive half sentence which he had just pronounced fell in exactly with the current of popular feeling at the time. The words flew from mouth to mouth. They were seen far and wide in England, printed around portraits and wreaths, embossed on snuff-boxes, or embroidered on pocket-books. It can scarcely be doubted that in the Parliamentary conflict they became a valuable auxiliary on the Minister's side.

Meanwhile, in the House of Commons Pitt was steadily pursuing the course on which he had from the first determined. On the 16th he brought forward three Resolutions ; the first a formal one, declaring the fact of the King's illness, and the second asserting in the clearest terms that it was both the right and duty of the two Houses to provide the means of supplying the defect in the Royal authority. For this purpose—so said the third Resolution—it was necessary that the two Houses should determine the means of giving the Royal Assent to such a Bill of Regency as they were about to pass. Being called upon to state what was meant by this last Resolution, Pitt explained that the Chancellor should be empowered by a joint vote of both Houses to put the Great Seal to a Commission for giving the Royal Assent to the intended Bill. This device—or this 'Phantom,' as the Opposition called it —to use the Great Seal without the King's authority, and to give the Royal Assent without the Royal knowledge, was no doubt a strange anomaly; yet it is hard to say, under such unprecedented difficulties, what lesser anomaly or what better expedient could have been devised.

It was against the second and essential Resolution, containing the pith of the scheme, that the main Opposition stand was made. We find, as we might expect, some complaints of 'rats' in the Ministerial correspondence of that time. The chiefs of Opposition had whispered that the reign of George the Third was now, in fact, at an end, and the Prince had condescended to assume the part of a canvasser for votes. He wrote himself to the Earl of Lonsdale, soliciting as a personal favour his aid on this occasion. The Earl issued his mandate accordingly, and 'Lord Lonsdale's people,' as Mr. Grenville terms them[1]—that is, the Members whom he nominated, declared themselves, reluctantly perhaps, against the Government.

great temper and great ability. Fox also, though labouring under severe indisposition, put forth his admirable powers. 'One of the best speeches I ever heard from him,' writes Mr. Grenville the next day. That great speech may, however, be justly charged with indiscretion; for in one passage Fox bitterly inveighed against his rival, alleging that Pitt would never have proposed any limitation on the Prince's power, had he not been conscious that he did not deserve the Prince's confidence, and would not be the Prince's Minister. But this unworthy taunt exposed him—and perhaps not him alone—to a most severe reply. 'I declare,' said Pitt, 'the attack which the Right Hon. gentleman has just now made to be unfounded, arrogant, and presumptuous. As to my being conscious that I do not deserve the favour of the Prince, I can only say that I know but one way in which I or any man could deserve it—by having uniformly endeavoured in a public situation to do my duty to the King his father, and to the country at large. If, in thus endeavouring to deserve the confidence of the Prince, it should appear that I, in fact, have lost it, however painful and mortifying that circumstance may be to me, and from whatever cause it may proceed, I may indeed regret it, but I will boldly say it is impossible I should ever repent of it.'

Of this reply from Pitt, Grenville says next day to his brother, 'I never heard a finer burst of eloquence, nor witnessed such an impression as it produced.' That impression was indeed perceptible in the division which ensued. Then, in spite of all the efforts of all the Prince's party, the second Resolution was affirmed by 268 votes against 204. 'The division exceeded our expectations,' writes Grenville. 'All the neutrals, and many of the wavering people, and some of the most timid of our friends were against us.'

The Resolution was again debated, but with no different issue, in its further stages. It is painful on one of these occasions to view so mighty an intellect as Burke's expose itself by its bursts of passion to the contempt of far inferior minds. Even Sir William Young, a Buckinghamshire Member altogether unknown to fame, could speak of him in one debate as 'Folly personified.' Burke had so far forgot himself as to compare the Chancellor to one of the least decent of the Pagan deities, and to draw a caricature description of his face. 'It is intended,' he said, 'as I have heard, to set up a man with black brows and a large wig; he is the fit person; trust none of the Royal family; he will be a kind of scarecrow to the two Houses; he is to give a fictitious assent in the King's name, and this is to be binding on the people! I do not approve of any robbery, whether housebreaking, highway robbery, or any other; yet each of them in my opinion is more excusable than this.'

In writing to Lord Buckingham, Sir William Young goes on to say of Burke that 'he finished his wild speech in a manner next to madness.' Burke was then inveighing against the supposed intention to restrain the Regent from any grant of peerages. 'It is not very decorous,' he cried. 'Suppose, for instance, the Prince wished to bestow honours on the house of Cavendish, would any person in this House have the audacity to dispute the propriety of such an honour? Or, suppose His Royal Highness should be disposed to revive the title of Rockingham——.' Strange that so profound a reasoner did not perceive that here he was striking a wrong chord! Strange that he could expect any public sympathy to this mere personal grievance! Strange that he should not anticipate the philosophic resignation with which the country would be disposed to bear the calamity that some months or some years must elapse before fresh honours could be heaped on one or other of the Great Whig Houses! Stranger still that he failed to see around him the anxiety of his own friends to restrain him, and the eagerness, as we find it recorded, of his opponents to cheer him onwards as hoping to hear from his loquacity the entire list of the intended Peers! A perfect hurricane of tumult was raised by such contending emotions, and to this, in nearly his concluding sentence, Burke referred. 'In vociferation and noise,' he cried, 'some persons are very great, but I know a set of hounds that would eclipse them.'

The three Resolutions of Pitt, being carried through the House of Commons, were next sent up for the concurrence of the House of Lords. The debate upon them stood fixed for the 26th of December. Up almost to that time Lord Thurlow does not seem to have wholly lost the hope of making some terms with the Prince; but on Christmas Day he sought a secret interview with Fox, and expressed his desire that the negotiation between them might be considered at an end. As Fox next day reports the matter to Lord Loughborough: 'It was much the pleasantest conversation I have had with him for many years. Upon the business of our interview he was perfectly open and explicit, and dismissed the subject as soon as possible with perfect good humour, in order to talk upon general ones in our old manner of conversing. He was in a talkative vein, and France, Spain, Hastings, Demosthenes, and Cicero were all talked over as if between two friends who had neither political contention nor enmity.' [1]

The Chancellor being thus set free from his late entanglement, took a decided part in the impending debate, and gave battle with great force to Lord Loughborough. In vain did Lord Rawdon, as a personal adherent of the Prince, interpose with an amendment tending to avoid a decision on the abstract point of right; the original Resolutions were affirmed by 99 Peers against 66.

By these votes of the Commons and the Lords the ground was cleared for Pitt's proposal with respect to the Regency Bill, a proposal hitherto kept secret, and indeed not yet fully matured. But during the interval he received a most signal token of the public esteem and approbation.

It was well known by the public that Pitt would not be continued one hour in office by the Regent. It was known that he had already taken measures for returning to his first profession. It was also known, perhaps, that his neglect of his private affairs had involved him in some debts, which he trusted to discharge by an industrious application of his talents at the Bar. At this very time, however, there was held, by public advertisement, a meeting of the principal bankers and moneyed men of London, anxious to tender him on his retirement from office a substantial mark of their esteem. The sum of 50,000*l.* was first proposed, but, so great was the enthusiasm, that in the space of forty-eight hours this sum was doubled, and Mr. George Rose, as his Secretary of the Treasury, was requested to press upon him, in the manner most likely to be acceptable, a free gift of 100,000*l.* But Mr. Pitt answered his friend as follows: 'No consideration upon earth shall ever induce me to accept it.'[1]

Surely it was not without reason, nor merely from the warmth of private friendship, that we find William Grenville at almost the same date exclaim to his brother, 'There certainly never was in this country at any period such a situation as Mr. Pitt's.'[2]

As regarded the plan of the impending Regency, it was on full deliberation the judgment of the Minister that the care of the Royal Person, together with the direction and appointment of all offices in the Royal Household, should remain with the Queen; that the Prince of Wales, as Regent, should have no power to grant peerages except to his brothers on their attaining the age of twenty-one; that His Royal Highness should not be enabled to grant the real or personal property of the King, nor any office in reversion, nor for any other term than during His Majesty's pleasure any pension or any office whatsoever except such as must by law be granted for life, or during good behaviour. These restrictions, as Mr. Pitt explained, were all founded on the hope of the King's recovery at no distant period. But if unhappily the reverse should prove to be the case, it would, he said, be open hereafter to the wisdom of Parliament to reconsider the arrangement it had made.

The first step of Mr. Pitt towards his Regency Bill was to announce its provisions in a letter to the Prince of Wales. This he did on the 30th of December. 'My dear Lord,' thus at once wrote the Prince to Loughborough, 'I have just received a letter from the Minister with such restrictions as no Dictator could possibly, I think, ever have been barefaced enough to have brought forward. Pray come to Charles's as soon as you possibly can, to take these matters into consideration.' Several other persons besides Fox and Loughborough were drawn by the Prince into council, and his reply to Pitt having been framed with great care, was on the 2nd of January, 1789, despatched in the name of His Royal Highness. This letter, which has been often printed, is certainly one of the best State-papers in the English language. Most stately and courteous in its tone, while most severe and searching in its comments, it comprises in its pregnant brevity all the arguments that could be urged against the Ministerial measure. This masterly performance came from the pen of Burke, and it may well enhance our just admiration of Burke's transcendent powers when we find him on so lofty an occasion enabled to adopt a wholly different style, lay aside his gorgeous imagery, and rise clear from those gusts of violence in which he had so recently indulged.

Two days afterwards Mr. Pitt, in the name of the whole Government, replied as follows to the Prince's letter:

Whitehall, Jan. 5, 1789.

The King's servants have received the paper which your Royal Highness was pleased to communicate to them through the Lord Chancellor.

They beg leave respectfully to assure your Royal Highness that if the plan which they took the liberty of submitting to your Royal Highness had appeared to them in the light in which they have the mortification to observe that it is considered by your Royal Highness, it would never have occurred to them to propose it. The King's servants, in forming this plan for the intermediate settlement which the present calamity requires, have had constantly in view that object of which your Royal Highness expresses the fullest approbation—restoring to the King, whenever His Majesty's health is sufficiently recovered, the personal exercise of that government which in right and law still resides with His Majesty, and also the providing in a competent manner for the intermediate preservation of that dignity which ought not to be separated from the Royal Person. In this view, while they considered the temporary exercise of the Royal authority on His Majesty's behalf and during His Majesty's illness as essentially different from the actual possession of the Crown, they have at the same time been anxious to extend that authority to every article which they could conceive essential or necessary for the temporary administration of the King's power. They have deeply to regret that a plan formed to the best of their judgment, for these purposes, should have appeared liable to the observations contained in the paper which your Royal Highness has been pleased to communicate. But as on the fullest deliberation they cannot but consider the principles of that plan as resulting from their indispensable duty to their Sovereign, and as there is no part of the subject on which your Royal Highness has intimated your pleasure for receiving any particular explanations, they trust they shall not be thought wanting in the respect which they owe, and which they must always be anxious to certify, to your Royal Highness, if they still feel themselves bound to adhere to these principles in the propositions to be offered to the consideration of Parliament.

On the same day as the date of the Prince's letter, the 2nd of January, and after a short illness, the Speaker, Mr. Cornwall, died. As might be expected from the state of parties, a contest ensued. The Government proposed Mr. Grenville, and the Opposition Sir Gilbert Elliot; but the former was elected by a large majority, 215 against 144. It was hoped, however, by the latter party that a new source of embarrassment to the Ministers had here arisen. The Duke of York, who in these transactions had taken part warmly with his elder brother, expressed in all companies his exultation that now the immediate appointment of a Regent was inevitable, since the new Speaker could not be confirmed without the Royal authority. But Pitt was not the man to be baffled by a mere obstacle of form. The new Speaker stated the case to the House for their instructions, and expressed his desire to follow the precedents of the Restoration and the Revolution, in neither of which cases was the Speaker presented for the Royal approval. The House acquiesced in this course, and the business of Parliament proceeded as before.

Next, however, there came another obstruction from the proposal which Fox warmly pressed of a new Committee to examine the King's physicians. He hoped to elicit some later evidence unfavourable to the prospect of His Majesty's recovery, and therefore unfavourable also to the restrictions proposed on His Royal Highness. Pitt granted the Committee, and it sat for a week. Dr. Willis, who appeared before it, underwent a long and bitter cross-examination by the Opposition chiefs, who could not forgive his sanguine hopes. With signal want of judgment they ventured on a scandalous and wholly unfounded insinuation, reflecting not only on himself, but on the Queen. They hinted, and the charge was re-echoed by the Opposition press, that the Queen and Dr. Willis were in collusion for the purpose of misrepresenting the health of the King, and of defeating the claims of the Prince. Such an allegation could only recoil upon its authors, as they speedily discovered by its effect upon the public out of doors.

When at last the Committee had given in its Report, not at all in the sense that Fox had expected, Pitt was able on the 16th of January to move five Resolutions embodying those restrictions on the Regency which he had announced in his letter to the Prince. In his opening speech he referred with just resentment to the calumnious insinuation which he had heard in the Committee up-stairs, and dared any one to bring it forward in a direct and tangible form. It was a charge of no common gravity on any physician that he should submit to be unduly influenced by a great personage, and consent to give an untrue account of His Majesty's health. It was a charge of no common gravity on an illustrious lady, 'who had lived for almost thirty years in this country without blame of any kind, a pattern of domestic tenderness and virtue, against whom the breath of calumny had not dared to send forth even a whisper, and who could merit it least of all at a moment when visited by the heaviest affliction.' And Pitt might have added, but he did not, how doubly hard, how doubly cruel, the charge against her if it had been sanctioned by one of her own sons.

In the debates that now ensued the principal spokesman on the Prince's side was Sheridan, and the chief struggle was on the fifth Resolution, which related to the Royal Household. But here the Minister again prevailed. A moderate amendment, moved by Lord North, to insert the words 'for a limited time,' was rejected on the 19th of January by 220 votes against 165.

The five Resolutions being communicated to the Lords, were by them affirmed, though not without a keen debate, a division, and a protest, the latter signed among others by their Royal Highnesses of York and Cumberland. The next step was to open Parliament in form by a Commission under the Great Seal, and the next, on the 5th of February, to introduce in the House of Commons the Regency Bill founded on the preceding Resolutions. The Bill passed rapidly through all its stages. The Opposition were dispirited by their recent failures. Fox was ill, and had gone to Bath. Burke alone indulged in some new sallies of passion. Thus one day we find him inveighing against the Minister, who he said was 'acting treason. By his Bill he intends not only to degrade the Prince of Wales, but to outlaw, excommunicate, and attaint the whole House of Brunswick.'

But here, amidst loud cries of 'Order,' Mr. Pitt rose. 'In any attacks upon myself,' he said, 'I seldom think it worth while to interrupt the Right Hon. gentleman, or, indeed, to make him any answer. But when the acts of the House are called in question, and a Bill, avowedly founded on those acts, is described in such terms as we have heard, I do hope that the House will interpose its authority.'

Still Burke was by no means checked in his wild career. On a later day he gave still much more offence by some words that seemed an insult to the King. He spoke of his afflicted Sovereign as 'having been by the Almighty hurled from his Throne and plunged into a condition which drew down upon him the pity of the meanest peasant in his kingdom!' But here a storm of indignation rose. Lord Graham sprang up and declared he would allow no man to say the King was hurled from the Throne. 'Take down his words!' cried other Members. Burke attempted to explain, but with slight effect upon the House.

The Regency Bill finally passed the House of Commons on the 12th of February. On the 17th and 18th the Peers discussed it in Committee. The Third Reading was close impending, and the Chancellor was ready to give immediately afterwards the substitute for the Royal Assent.

But a change was now at hand in the King's health. On the 2nd of February Miss Burney met the King by accident for the first time since the 5th of November. He was walking in Kew Gardens between the two Doctors Willis, and engaged her in conversation for a considerable time. She observed some wildness in his eyes, and a great deal of incoherence in his language. From the 6th the improvement grew rapid and decided. Dr. Willis, who was in daily communication with Mr. Pitt, declared himself clearly of opinion that after a short period no part of His Majesty's mental disorder would remain. For some time Dr. Warren was reluctant to acknowledge any real improvement in the face of his gloomy predictions. But ere long he was overpowered by the force of facts. The public bulletin of the 12th of February mentioned 'progressive amendment,' and that of the 17th 'a state of convalescence.'

Still Pitt and Lord Thurlow, feeling the magnitude of the point at issue, hesitated. But Dr. Willis was clear in his own opinion. He sought an interview with Lord Thurlow, and repeated that opinion in the strongest terms. As the story was afterwards told by one of his sons, Dr. Willis actually 'bullied' the Chancellor before he could make him stir in the matter.

On the 19th, however, a Cabinet was held, and in consequence of the decision which was there adopted the Chancellor that same evening rose in the House of Lords, and announcing the auspicious news proposed that the Committee on the Regency Bill should be put off till the 23rd. 'And,' Miss Burney adds, 'this evening, for the first time, the King came upstairs to drink tea with the Queen and Princesses in the drawing-room. Huzza! huzza!'

On that afternoon also Pitt wrote to his mother, after several weeks of silence, to give her the good news.

Thursday, Feb. 19, 1789.

My dear Mother,—You will have seen for some days how constantly the news from Kew has been improving. The public account this morning is that the King continues advancing in recovery. The private one is that he is to all appearance perfectly well, and if it were the case of a private man, would be immediately declared so. It remains only to consider how far he can bear the impression of the state of public business; but in consequence of these circumstances the Bill will probably be postponed in the House of Lords to-day till Monday; and if the prospect is then confirmed, the plan of the Regency must probably be altered with a view to a very short interval indeed, or perhaps wholly laid aside. This intelligence will be welcome enough to excuse a short letter, and I could not resist the pleasure of communicating it, though not in a moment, as you may imagine, of much more leisure than even for some time past under different circumstances.

Ever, my dear Mother, &c., W. Pitt.

On the 20th the Chancellor went himself to Kew, and had an interview of an hour and a quarter with the King. He was with His Majesty again on the 22nd, and reported to Pitt that he never at any period had seen him more composed, collected, and distinct. On the 23rd—thus writes Mr. Grenville to his brother at Dublin Castle—'the two Princes were at Kew, and saw the King in the Queen's apartment. She was present the whole time, a precaution for which, God knows, there was but too much reason. They kept him waiting a considerable time before they arrived, and after they left him drove immediately to Mrs. Armistead's in Park Street, in hopes of finding Fox there, to give him an account of what had passed.'

Later on the same day, the 23rd, the King wrote his first letter since his illness to Pitt; an excellent letter, as Wilberforce, to whom it was shown in confidence, calls it in his Diary. On the morrow ensued the first interview between the Monarch and the Minister. Pitt on his return from Kew called upon Grenville, and gave him in perfect unreserve an account of what had passed. 'I was with the King,' he said, 'above an hour this morning. There was not the smallest trace or appearance of any disorder. His manner was unusually composed and dignified, but there was no other difference whatever from what I had been used to see. The King spoke of his disorder as of a thing past, and which had left no other impression on his mind than that of gratitude for his recovery, and a sense of what he owed to those who had stood by him. He spoke of these in such a manner as brought tears into his eyes, but with that degree of affection of mind there was not the least appearance of his disorder. After I had left His Majesty I conversed with Willis, who told me that he now thought the King quite well; that he could not perceive the least trace remaining of his malady.'

Thus fell to the ground at once the Regency Bill, and all that airy fabric of hopes which the Opposition had reared upon it. The sole remaining question was whether the King's resumption of authority should be by his own act or through an examination of physicians. The latter course would have been the more logical and Parliamentary, but the former was most in accordance with personal respect and public feeling, and this was accordingly preferred.

The exultation of the great body of the people at the good news of the King's recovery was most warmly shown. On the day when he resumed his authority there was, unbidden by the Government, a general illumination of London. His domestic virtues could not but be contrasted in the minds of all by-standers with the character and recent conduct of the Prince of Wales. As a day of public Thanksgiving the 23rd of April was appointed, and it was kept with every token of heartfelt joy and gratitude in all the churches and chapels of the kingdom.

The public joy which appeared throughout the land on the 23rd of April attained its highest pitch, its most eminent manifestation, in London, where the King and Queen, attended by the Royal Family, by the two Houses of Parliament, and by the great Officers of State, went in procession to attend the solemn service of Thanksgiving at St. Paul's. The streets along the line of route, the windows and the platforms which had been raised beside them, were thronged with an innumerable concourse of spectators; and within the cathedral no sooner had His Majesty reached the open space under the great dome, than the organ, accompanied by the voices of above five thousand children of the City Charity Schools, began the hundredth psalm. The simple melody joined to the spectacle much affected the King. He had walked in between the Bishop of London and the Bishop of Lincoln as Dean of St. Paul's; and turning to the latter, he said with great emotion, 'I now feel that I have been ill.' In the evening there ensued a second illumination, general and brilliant beyond all former example.

The day of Thanksgiving at St. Paul's is regarded by Lord Macaulay as the zenith in the political life of Mr. Pitt. 'To such a height of power and glory,' he says, 'had this extraordinary man risen at twenty-nine years of age. And now,' he adds, perhaps less justly, 'the tide was on the turn.'

The joy in England at the restoration of the King, though its mainspring was the national loyalty, might no doubt be further heightened on considering what would have been the results in Ireland had his malady continued. The most eminent members of the Irish Legislature had come to London in December. Mr. Grattan had closely watched the proceedings of the House of Commons from beneath the Gallery, but had given no public indication of his views. In truth, however, so far as the question of Regency was concerned, he had thoroughly espoused the opinions of Fox. When, therefore, the Irish Parliament met in February, Grattan, far from following the precedent set in England, moved an Address to the Prince of Wales inviting him to assume, during the King's illness, the Government of Ireland, with full kingly powers. This Address was carried in both Houses. Being then in due form laid before the Lord Lieutenant, His Excellency replied that a sense of his official duty as a sworn servant of the King must preclude him from transmitting, as was requested, this Address to England. Then the two Houses, again urged on by Grattan, resolved to send over their Address by delegates of their own. For this mission the Commons chose four of their members, and the Peers the Duke of Leinster and Lord Charlemont.

It follows, therefore, that had not George the Third at this very period resumed his Royal functions, the Regency in the two countries would have been held on wholly different tenures—in England with restricted, in Ireland with unrestricted authority. Hard it seems to say whether such a result, if carried to its full consequences, would have been attended with most of inconvenience or most of ridicule; and this instance is alone sufficient to cast the gravest doubts in an Imperial point of view on the wisdom and policy of that Legislative Equality which Grattan had achieved in 1782.

On reviewing the whole of these Parliamentary conflicts, they will be found, I think, to reflect high honour on Mr. Pitt. He had certainly an up-hill battle to fight. With the general belief, in the first instance, that the King's recovery was hopeless, there was also a general desire to find favour with the Prince of Wales. And the question being wholly new, there was no inconsistency involved in any vote that might be given on the side of His Royal Highness. Nothing but the consummate skill and unconquerable firmness of Pitt could have waged so unequal a conflict with success. Even these might not have prevailed, had they not been aided by the faults of his opponents. The whole conduct of the Prince's friends, from the first claim of right by Fox down to the last gust of passion from Burke, does indeed display an extraordinary series of errors. Had they done what was prudent, or, what is often most prudent in difficult emergencies, done nothing at all, the majority of Pitt might have wavered or broke asunder, and the restrictions which he deemed requisite might not have been imposed.

But the argument may be carried further still. We may observe that all the delays and obstructions which took place in the appointment of a Regency, came, not from Mr. Pitt, but from his opponents. Had they not, besides putting forward their inadmissible claim of right, moved for new Committees and fresh examinations, the Prince of Wales must have assumed the government soon after Christmas. The King after his recovery more than once declared that, had he then found a Regency established, he should have regarded it as an Act of Lunacy against himself, and should have refused to resume his power. But in any case the authority of the Prince as Regent, and of Mr. Fox as Minister, even had it endured only a few weeks, would have been of no slight importance. A great number of Members of Parliament desirous of supporting the Government of the day would have passed over to the new standard and become committed to it; and if Mr. Pitt had then come back to office under the King's resumed authority, it would have been as shorn of no small part of his past ascendant.

It may be added before I quit this subject, that the King's recovery, though complete for all purposes of government, was not clear of all clouds, nor free from all danger of relapse. His letters to Mr. Pitt during the remainder of the Session contain many complaints that he did not feel well. It appears also that Dr. Willis and his son Dr. John paid occasional visits to the King, both at Kew and Windsor, during the months of April, May, and June.

We may also observe that on the King's recovery his attachment to his Chancellor appeared the same as before. Perhaps Mr. Pitt may have been unwilling to agitate His Majesty, and forbore from stating to him the treacherous conduct of Lord Thurlow during the Royal malady. Perhaps the King, in spite of such a statement, may have retained his former feelings. Certain it is that we find him, in writing to Mr. Pitt, on April 21, 1789, strongly press for a cordial concert between his two principal Ministers. But the Chancellor proved the truth of the vigorous lines,

> Forgiveness to the injured does belong:—
> But they ne'er pardon who have done the wrong.

It was he who, ever since the King's recovery, showed aversion and bitterness to Mr. Pitt, rather than Mr. Pitt to him.

CHAPTER XIII.

Pitt's financial measures—Wilberforce's Speech on the Slave Trade—Mr. Addington elected Speaker—Promotions in the Peerage—Duel between the Duke of York and Colonel Lennox—National defences—Lord Buckingham's wish for a Dukedom—Refused by the King—Lord Westmorland appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—Trial of Stockdale—French Revolution—Opinions of Fox and Burke—Policy of Pitt—Affair of Nootka Sound—Dissolution of Parliament—The Westminster Election— Continued difference with Spain—Secret negotiation at Paris—Convention signed at Madrid—Dr. Price and Lord Stanhope—Essay on the French Revolution by Burke.

On the restoration of the King to health, the debates in Parliament, so long confined to the single topic of his illness, resumed their customary course. In finance, Pitt consented to remit the Shop-tax, which he had imposed in 1785. It had grown highly unpopular, above all in London and Westminster, which paid, as is alleged, three fourths of the whole tax; and Fox had brought forward annual motions against it, which Pitt had successfully resisted, but in which his majorities had declined.

Another financial measure of this year related to the tax upon tobacco. Pitt had calculated that twelve millions of pounds were annually consumed in the kingdom, while the legal importation was only of seven millions; so that no less than five millions must be smuggled, at a loss to the revenue of 300,000*l.* a year. To remedy this pernicious system, Pitt proposed and carried a Bill, transferring the greater part of the duty from the Customs to the Excise, and therefore, of course, subjecting the manufacturer of tobacco to the survey of the Exciseman.

In 1789, owing chiefly to the delays produced by the King's illness, the House of Lords could allot only seventeen days to the trial of Hastings, so that little progress was made. But the vehemence of Burke exposed the party of the prosecutors to considerable disadvantage. In opening the Charge relative to presents, on the 21st of April, he travelled far beyond the limits of that Charge, asserting in express terms that Hastings had murdered Nuncomar by the hands of Sir Elijah Impey. Upon this Mr. Hastings drew up, and Major Scott presented, a petition to the House of Commons, complaining of such unauthorised allegations on the part of those who professed to speak as the representatives and from the instructions of the House. Several warm debates ensued. Fox did his best to vindicate his friend; but with better reason Pitt maintained that it was utterly unjustifiable in the Managers to bring forward accusations against Mr. Hastings which were not contained in the Articles of Impeachment, and which could not therefore be comprised in the directions of the House. And finally, on the motion of the Marquis of Graham, one of the Lords of the Treasury, a vote of censure was carried, by a large majority, upon the words which Burke had used.

On the 8th of May Mr. Henry Beaufoy renewed the motion for a repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. Though withstood both by Pitt and Lord North—a present and a late Prime Minister—there was but a small majority against the motion; the numbers being 122 and 102. This deserves to be noticed as one of the last occasions when the Commons' debates display to us the once familiar name of Lord North. His health had become impaired, and next year he succeeded his father as Earl of Guilford.

Another proposal made in this Session by Mr. Beaufoy was to set apart by Act of Parliament a day of annual Thanksgiving for the Revolution of 1688. The Bill for this purpose passed the Commons with little notice or remark. But in the Lords it stirred up so much indignation in the breast of at least one Prelate, Bishop Warren of Bangor, that his Lordship would not, according to the usual form, await the Second Reading, but opposed it even on the first. This Bill, the Bishop said, was quite unnecessary, since the great event of the Revolution was already commemorated by the Church in the Service of the 5th of November—'a Service,' added his Lordship, 'drawn up with great gravity and wisdom, and as unexceptionable a Service as any in the whole Book of Common Prayer.' On the other hand, Lord Stanhope, replying to the Bishop of Bangor, found great fault with the Service of the 5th of November. But the Chancellor declaring his full agreement with the Bishop, the Bill was thrown out, in a thin House, by thirteen Peers to six.

On the 12th of May Mr. Wilberforce brought forward the question of the Slave Trade. His speech of three hours and a quarter was acknowledged as one of the ablest and most powerful ever heard in Parliament. He was warmly supported both by Pitt and Fox. Yet, strange as it may seem, the cause for which such men combined, instead of making further way, receded. The exertions of the planters, the cries of Liverpool and Bristol, had succeeded in creating a vague, but prevalent feeling of alarm. The Abolition of the nefarious traffic had begun to be commonly looked upon as a fine-spun theory; sounding well in speeches, but likely to be ruinous in practice. All that could be done this year was to avoid an open defeat by calling for further evidence at the Bar of the House of Commons.

Before the close of the Session there was another vacancy in the Chair of the House of Commons. During the King's illness Grenville had agreed to fill that post, as a temporary measure at a difficult crisis, and with a clear understanding that it was 'not to prejudice his other views.' In June accordingly he was named Secretary of State, in the place of Lord Sydney. He was succeeded as Speaker, on the nomination of the Government, by Henry Addington, son of the physician and friend of Lord Chatham, and himself a friend of Pitt. It proved an excellent choice, though questionable at the outset on the ground of youth and inexperience, since Addington had but just completed his thirty-second year.

Lord Sydney did not retire from Downing Street without some substantial tokens of the friendship and esteem of Pitt. He received a sinecure office for life, as Chief Justice of Eyre, which had recently fallen vacant, and was worth 2,500*l.* a year.[1] Moreover he was advanced a step in the Peerage as Viscount Sydney, and his eldest son was made a Lord of the Admiralty. The wishes of the Earl of Salisbury, Lord Chamberlain, and of Viscount Weymouth were also gratified by a like promotion. The former became Marquis of Salisbury, and the latter Marquis of Bath. Lord Fortescue having represented, through Mr. Pitt, that he stood high in the list of Barons, and that an Earldom had already been held in his family, he was advanced to that dignity. The King, in the letter which expressed his assent to these favours, proposed of his own accord another Earldom for Lord Mount Edgcumbe, which was conferred accordingly. A little later in the year, William Eden, now ambassador at the Hague, was raised to the Irish peerage as Lord Auckland.

In the spring of this year was fought a duel between the Duke of York and Colonel Lennox, nephew and heir-presumptive of the Duke of Richmond. The Colonel had gone up to His Royal Highness, on the parade at St. James's, and asked for an explanation of some disparaging words, relative to himself, which the Duke was reported to have used elsewhere. The Duke with great propriety ordered the Colonel to return to his post; but when the parade was over, His Royal Highness went into the Orderly Room, sent for Colonel Lennox, and in the presence of all the other officers said to him, 'I desire to derive no protection from my rank as a Prince, or my station as commanding officer. When not on duty I wear a brown coat, and shall be ready as a private gentleman to give you satisfaction.' In consequence a meeting took place at Wimbledon, both parties to fire upon a signal given. The ball of Colonel Lennox grazed one of the Duke's curls, but His Royal Highness did not fire in return, and the seconds then put a close to the affair. The result was mainly to exhibit in strong colours the unhappy estrangement which late events had wrought in the Royal Family: for a ball being given at St. James's shortly afterwards, Colonel Lennox received an invitation from Her Majesty; and it is added, not perhaps on sufficient grounds, that on coming he was treated with marked attention.[1]

In the summer, the King being advised to confirm his health by some sea-bathing, went to Weymouth, accompanied by the Queen and Princesses. His mode of life upon the coast is thus described :—'He usually rises at six, walks the Parade till eight, takes breakfast before ten, rides till three, dines at four, and resumes the promenade with the Queen and Princesses till late in the evening, provided the weather be fine.' Sometimes the scene was varied by a sailing party on the sea, or an excursion inland; and their Majesties visited both Exeter and Plymouth before they returned to Windsor.[1]

Towards the same period we find Pitt write to Lady Chatham, and refer with great interest to the events in France. It was on the very day of the taking of the Bastille.

Downing Street, July 14, 1789.

My dear Mother,—I find at last a little leisure for using my pen, from the circumstance, which the papers would inform you of, of my being within these two days a prisoner from a lameness, which is just enough to confine me, and to justify some pretensions to the name of gout. Lest it should be magnified into more than it is, I am anxious that you should receive from myself a certificate of my being in all other respects perfectly well, and feeling very little inconvenience indeed from this slight specimen of what I have long been very well entitled to. I am very happy to be able to tell you that we draw within sight of the close of the Session, not very long after which I hope to find myself at liberty to extend my excursion as far as Burton. Indeed I flatter myself the King's stay in the West will give me a very good opportunity of remaining in that part of the world something nearer a reasonable time than has been the case in any of my visits lately. You will easily believe this makes me not the less impatient for the Recess, which promises at present, in all respects, a good share of holidays. Our neighbours in France seem coming to actual extremes, the King having suddenly dismissed M. Necker, and appearing determined to support his authority against the National Assembly. This scene, added to the prevailing scarcity, makes that country an object of compassion, even to a rival.

Believe me ever, my dear Mother, &c.,

W. Pitt.

Let me add my affectionate compliments to Mrs. Stapleton, and kind remembrances to Mrs. Sparry. I long to see your sweet little companions, whom I can hardly expect to know again.

The 'little companions' mentioned in this letter were Pitt's three nieces, the Ladies Stanhope, who were then on a visit to their grandmother. Owing to Lord Stanhope's estrangement from him, he had not seen them for a considerable time.

The following letter from the Duke of Richmond indicates not his own views merely, but those of Pitt, at this period in respect to national defences.

Goodwood, Sept. 13, 1789.

My dear Sir,

. . . .

I perfectly agree with you that the popular prejudice in favour of the Navy and against fortifications is so great, that it would be much easier to avail oneself of the former than to combat the latter; and I think if all was ready to set these people at work immediately on bringing water into Plymouth Dock town for the use of the navy, it would be best so to employ them. But the misfortune is that neither the plan is sufficiently settled to be able to proceed upon immediately, nor the ground through which the stream must be brought purchased, so that until an Act of Parliament is passed to buy the land, nothing material can be done. But if the works on Maker could be gone on with, they might begin to-morrow. I suggested this as an idea which might possibly be mentioned to the Western members; and if they approved of it as a remedy for such a dangerous case, I think it might be adopted; but while things are quiet, people are very apt to neglect the means of keeping them so, and the same idea will prevail more than it ought on account of France's present situation. It will make us too secure, and neglect the going on with those fortifications which, take my word for it, we shall some day regret not having pursued; but I am sensible how difficult it is to impress this idea generally, and therefore, like most other things, it must take its chance, and be governed by that great agent accident, instead of prudence. I shall, however, prepare the plan for getting the water to Plymouth Dock as you desire.

I shall at all times be happy to see you, and am only sorry it is likely to be so late as a month hence, as I wish to show you two very long letters I have had from the Chancellor, and my answer. He is by no means in good humour, and there are some points I wish much to talk to you upon. I am ever most truly and sincerely yours,

RICHMOND.

During the November of this year we find Lord Buckingham in a most resentful mood. Early in the spring he had been much incensed in the matter of a military promotion, which the King thought the right of Colonel Gwynn, but which the Marquis claimed for a kinsman of his own. In the summer he came over to take the waters of Bath, and in the autumn he finally resigned his Vice-Royalty on the ground of illness. 'The wretched state of my health, sacrificed in the discharge of my duty:' such was his language at the time to Mr. Pitt. But he declared that the obloquy which he had incurred in Ireland during the King's illness called for 'some distinct and special mark of His Majesty's favour.' The mark of favour at which he pointed was a Dukedom. He pressed it in the strongest manner both on his brother William and on Mr. Pitt, and the latter promised to do his utmost in the Closet after the next Drawing Room.

In pursuance of the same object we find on the 6th of November William Grenville write: 'The Drawing Room was so very late yesterday, that it was impossible for Pitt to go into the Closet afterwards, as it was not over till past five, and the King had to go back to Windsor afterwards. This being the case, we have agreed that, to prevent any further delay, Pitt shall write to the King upon the subject, stating all the arguments. . . . I own I am by no means sorry that the lateness of the Drawing Room has given a plea for having recourse to this mode, as I have always observed it to succeed best with the King. All the points may be more forcibly urged by being collected and stated in reference to each other in a manner which the King's desultory way of speaking makes almost impossible.'—These last words deserve particular attention. They supply an answer to the question which is sometimes put why in 1801 Mr. Pitt, when he was pleading for the Roman Catholic claims and staking the existence of his Ministry upon them, thought it best to write to the King instead of asking an audience of His Majesty.

It was impossible to write a more pressing letter than did Mr. Pitt to forward the wishes of Lord Buckingham. The King, however, refused. He had no objection, as we have seen, to create Marquises and Earls, but he was determined to reserve the rank of Duke for the Princes of his family.

At this refusal the 'pain and misery' of Lord Buckingham (such are his own words in his letter to Pitt) were great indeed. He announced to the Minister his fixed determination, as a sign of his displeasure, to resign the Lord Lieutenancy of the county. 'I hope you will forgive my adding,' so answered Pitt on the 12th of November, 'that the step which you meditate in consequence is not only painful to me for a thousand reasons both public and personal, but is one which seems likely to produce effects in the public impression the reverse of everything you would yourself wish. . . . . I really feel so anxious on the subject that I cannot help having a wish to be able to state to you in conversation, before you take your final resolution, all that occurs to me on the subject; and if I thought it would not be inconvenient to you, I should be very glad to take the first day of leisure to come to you at Stowe for that purpose. I am pretty sure that I should have nothing to prevent my doing it on Sunday next.'

Mr. Pitt went accordingly to Stowe on the day he proposed, and he appears to have in great measure pacified his cousin. With praiseworthy caution on such delicate topics we find him, in writing to Lady Chatham, speak of this as though it had been only a trip of pleasure.

Holwood, Nov. 21, 1789.

My excursions all proved extremely pleasant. The last has been to Stowe, where I went last Sunday, and found Lord Buckingham getting much better.

The selection of a new Lord Lieutenant for Ireland was a matter of great perplexity. At length Pitt pitched upon John Fane, tenth Earl of Westmorland, who was born, like himself, in 1759. Few public men have been longer in high office. Thirty-seven years from the time when he was sent to Ireland we find him still a member of Lord Liverpool's Cabinet. 'There are several points,' so writes Mr. Grenville in October, 1789, 'in which Westmorland would do perfectly. There are those in which he fails, but God knows the list to choose out of is not long.'

In the same month of November, the King, perceiving the continued alienation of the Chancellor from the Prime Minister, addressed a letter to the first upon the subject. He received a most satisfactory reply. Lord Thurlow appears to have promised that he would give Mr. Pitt no further grounds to complain. But the promise was not fulfilled.

On the 9th of December came on before Lord Kenyon the trial of Mr. John Stockdale. He had been the publisher, two years before, of a pamphlet which contained some violent language against the promoters of Hastings's trial. In February, 1788, Fox had brought it before the House of Commons as an heinous case of libel. 'I admit the libel,' said Pitt, 'and I observe that I am myself comprised in it, yet I see nothing so peculiarly heinous as to warrant our singling out this publication from the general mass.' Nevertheless Fox prevailed. He moved and carried an Address to the King, desiring that the author and publisher might be prosecuted by the Attorney-General. When the trial came on, Erskine was counsel for Stockdale, and delivered one of the most masterly of his many masterly speeches at the Bar. The result justified the prudence of Pitt, for the Jury, after some deliberation, brought in a verdict of Not Guilty.[1]

We are now come in order of time to that great French Revolution, doomed in its speedy consequences to subdue the greater part of Europe, and to try to the utmost the energy of Pitt, the strength and spirit of England. For many years past had that mighty storm been gathering; its signs unheeded by the world at large, but surely discerned by the leading spirits of the age. Thus wrote Chesterfield in 1752: 'But this I foresee in France, that before the end of this century the trade of both King and Priest will not be half so good a one as it has been.'[2] And thus wrote Rousseau in 1762: 'We are approaching a state of crisis and an age of Revolutions.'[3]

Of the French Revolution, however, I shall not attempt in any detail either to examine the causes, or to relate the progress. Let it here suffice to say, that the Assembly of Notables, as planned by M. de Calonne, failing in its object, drew on, by its failure, the long-dreaded convocation of the States-General. That important body, which had lain dormant since 1614, and which had grown the more formidable from its long disuse, met again on the 5th of May, 1789. Not long content with the traditions of the past, it speedily proclaimed itself 'the National Assembly.' Then the dismissal of Necker, and the unpopularity of the King and Queen, precipitated a catastrophe which no skill perhaps could have quite averted. First did the popular fury turn against the Ancient State-Prison on the Boulevards of Paris. On the memorable 14th of July, the multitude, rising in arms, assailed and took the Bastille, and put to death in cold blood the chief men of its feeble garrison. Tumult and riot ensued in several other parts of the kingdom. Tumult and riot may be said to have prevailed even in the National Assembly; for there, on the night of the 4th of August, in a giddy whirl of enthusiasm, and without a word of deliberation, with no thought for existing interests, and with no provision for current business, these raw legislators swept away in a single vote the complicated privileges of a thousand years —the rights of the Clergy, the rights of the Nobles, the rights of the Parliament, and the rights of the provinces.

Yet, enormous as was the amount of these inconsiderate concessions, the mob of Paris was not willing to acquiesce in any course of regular government. Elated with their past success as destroyers of the Bastille, and instigated by a secret Society, which soon afterwards took the name of 'Jacobins,' they again rose in arms on the 5th of October, amidst loud cries—'To Versailles! to Versailles!' and thither they marched accordingly, in yelling procession. The unfounded self-reliance of General de Lafayette, as Commander of the National Guard, combined to their triumph with the irresolution of Louis the Sixteenth. They broke into the palace, butchered two of the Gardes-du-Corps; and finally brought back the King and Queen, still in name and title their Sovereigns, but in truth their captives, to Paris. Even at that time it became apparent that neither the King, nor yet the Assembly, nor yet the people of the country, but only the mob of the capital, had the true direction of affairs. Even then might have been applied those words which the Minister of the United States, in France, afterwards used as summing up his experience of the Revolution in that kingdom:— 'It has appeared to me that Paris decides for the whole of France, and that the populace decides for Paris.'[1] [1] Gouverneur Morris to Randolph, April 15, 1794, as published in Morris's Life and Correspondence.

It was natural that even at the outset these great events should be regarded from opposite points of view. Men who considered only the abuses of the old French Monarchy, might rejoice in its probable overthrow. Other men, who saw those abuses as clearly, might nevertheless abhor spoliation too, and distrust mob-violence as an instrument of reformation. And from the very first, as it chanced, the two leaders of the Whig party in the House of Commons, Fox and Burke, inclined to these opposite sides. Thus only a few days after the taking of the Bastille we find Fox exultingly exclaim :—'How much it is the greatest event that ever happened in the world! And how much the best![1] And here, on the contrary, are some expressions of Burke a few weeks later, when writing to a friend in France :—'You hope, Sir, that I think the French deserving of liberty. I certainly do. I certainly think that all men who desire it, deserve it. It is not the reward of our merit, or the acquisition of our industry. It is our inheritance. It is the birth-right of our species. But whenever a separation is made between liberty and justice, neither is in my opinion safe.'[2]

This divergence of opinion was not long confined to private letters. It broke forth publicly in the Session which commenced in the January following. The King, who opened that Session in person, stated in the Speech from the Throne that the affairs of the Continent had engaged his most serious attention; but he passed no other judgment upon them. Nor was any increase, however moderate, proposed in the Army Estimates. The number was still as last year, for between 17,000 and 18,000 effective men. Fox nevertheless urged some reduction, though not, as he acknowledged, on any Constitutional ground. For the example of a neighbouring nation, said he, had proved that former imputations on a standing army were unfounded calumnies; and it was now known throughout Europe, that, by becoming a soldier, a man did not cease to be a citizen.

These and some other such expressions on the part of the Member for Westminster called forth on a subsequent day the Member for Malton. Throwing, as was his wont, his whole heart into the subject, Burke delivered the first of his beautiful philippics, spoken or written, against the French Revolution. 'Since the House,' he said, 'was prorogued in the summer, much work has been done in France. The French have shown themselves the ablest architects of ruin that had hitherto existed in the world. In that very short space of time they have completely pulled down to the ground their Monarchy, their Church, their nobility, their law, their revenue, their army, their navy, their commerce, their arts, and their manufactures. They have done their business for us as rivals, in a way which twenty Ramilies or Blenheims could never have done. Were we absolute conquerors, and France to lie prostrate at our feet, we should be ashamed to send a Commission to settle their affairs which would impose so hard a law upon the French, and so destructive of all their consequence as a nation, as that they had imposed upon themselves.'

Such were the discordant opinions proclaimed on this subject and at this period from the main Opposition bench. Fox in his views was supported—perhaps even outrun—by Sheridan; Burke in his by Windham; and the breach thus begun, seemed far more likely to widen than to close.

The views of Pitt, at this period, while greatly differing from Fox's, were by no means altogether the same as Burke's. 'The present convulsions of France,' he said, 'must sooner or later terminate in general harmony and regular order; and though such a situation might make her more formidable, it might also make her less obnoxious as a neighbour. I wish for the restoration of tranquillity in that country, although it appears to me distant. Whenever her system shall become restored, if it should prove freedom rightly understood, freedom resulting from good order and good government, France would stand forward as one of the most brilliant Powers in Europe. Nor can I regard with envious eyes any approximation in neighbouring States to those sentiments which are the characteristics of every British subject.' [1]

It was not, however, upon France that the main attention of our Ministers was then directed. Still more anxiously did they turn their eyes to Spain, where a serious difference had arisen, threatening a positive war. Captain Cook in one of his voyages had explored an extensive Sound, called by the natives Nootka, on the coast, as he supposed, of the North American continent, but in truth of Vancouver's Island. It seemed a position well adapted to supply the Chinese market with furs, and since 1786 some Englishmen in India had commenced this trade. More recently two ships of larger size had been despatched, and some grants of land were obtained from the native chiefs. But these proceedings had been viewed with the utmost jealousy by the Spanish officers in Mexico. With no just claim upon this district, either by discovery or occupation, they had recourse to an arrogant boast. They asserted that their Sovereign was entitled as of right to all lands on the western coast of America between Cape Horn and the sixtieth degree of north latitude.

In the spring of 1789, accordingly, an English vessel, the Iphigenia, under Captain Douglas, was peaceably anchored in Nootka Sound, and the operations of trade were in quiet progress, when there appeared two Spanish ships of war sent from the port of San Blas, and commanded by Don Estevan Martinez. For some days nothing but civilities passed between them, till of a sudden the Iphigenia was seized in the name of the King of Spain; the officers and crew being conveyed on board the Spanish ships and put in irons. Nor was the Iphigenia restored, and permission granted them to sail away to the Sandwich Islands, until after the entire plunder of her cargo and their property. The British flag on the new settlement was pulled down, and the Spanish hoisted in its place; and at a later period three other smaller vessels were likewise seized and detained.

So grievous an insult could not fail to be resented by a country like England, and a Minister like Pitt. Prompt and vigorous representations on the subject were addressed to the Court of Madrid. The Spaniards answered that the Iphigenia, with her officers and crew, had been already released by an order from the Viceroy of Mexico, but solely on account of the presumed ignorance of those officers, who had, though unknowingly, trespassed on the dominion of Spain. That dominion—that exclusive right of trade and navigation on the north-west coast of America—was still pertinaciously asserted at Madrid, but no less pertinaciously resisted in London. And intelligence was now received that on finding the English Cabinet thus firm, the Spaniards, rather than yield, were collecting their fleets at Cadiz and Ferrol, and otherwise preparing for war.

Up to this time the secret of these critical negotiations had been carefully kept. But on the 4th of May the country was surprised by an Order for the general impressment of seamen; and on the following day a Message from the King, announcing the prospect of war, was presented to both Houses; to the Commons by Mr. Pitt, and to the Lords by the Duke of Leeds, for to the Dukedom of Leeds had Lord Carmarthen now succeeded. In reply, there were Addresses assuring His Majesty of the support of Parliament; and a vote of credit for a million was passed. These were all carried with one voice, although some chief men in Opposition—Fox, Francis, and Grey—made objections and raised debates on some collateral points, as the absence of our ambassador from Madrid, and the trifling value of the trade to Nootka Sound.

These debates on foreign policy may be deemed the most important of that Session. There was also a motion by Mr. Flood for a Reform in Parliament, which was lost without a division, and in which Flood did not altogether sustain the high reputation which he had earned in Ireland. Further, there was a motion by Fox for the repeal of the Test Act. He was opposed not only by Pitt, but by Burke and Wilberforce, and defeated by a majority of almost three to one. The speech of Burke above all excited great attention. He owned that ten years before, he should, far from opposing, have supported this motion; but he pointed to the growing influence and dangerous example of the French Revolution, and he read passages from the writings of both Dr. Price and Dr. Priestley to show that the total subversion of the Church had become the avowed object of some leading Dissenters.

Six years had the Parliament now endured, and its Prorogation on the 10th of June was immediately followed by its Dissolution. There was little of popular excitement in the new elections. It was felt by the nation at large that when Pitt had declared earlier in the Session that 'we are adding daily to our strength, wealth, and prosperity,'[1] he had uttered no vain or empty boast; and that our flourishing condition was in no small degree the work of his able hands. Under the impression of these feelings the triumphant Ministerial majority which the old elections had given was more than confirmed by the new. Fox was enabled to maintain his seat for Westminster, but not as before with Townshend for a colleague. Lord Hood appeared once more as the Ministerial candidate. No other came forward, on either the regular Government or regular Opposition side, but only Horne Tooke on the

[1] Speech of February 5, 1790.

'Independent interest,' so that Fox and Hood were easily returned.

The cause of the tranquillity of Westminster and retirement of Townshend will best appear from the following Memorandum written in Mr. Dundas's hand, and preserved among Mr. Pitt's papers:—

On the 15th March, 1790, Lord Lauderdale and Mr. Pitt held a conversation on the subject of the Westminster election, Mr. Dundas present.

They agreed that each party should propose and support only one candidate respectively at the first general election, and during the whole of next Parliament, so long as either the Duke of Portland or Mr. Fox on the one part, and Mr. Pitt or Mr. Grenville on the other, are alive, and including every other contingency of death, vacancy, and changes of administration.

In this conversation Mr. Pitt agreed in the name of the present administration or any of which he or Mr. Grenville should be a member.

Lord Lauderdale agreed in the name, and as authorised by the Duke of Portland or Mr. Fox, or any administration of which either should be a member.

It was understood that this agreement has nothing to do with any question respecting the right of election for the city of Westminster.

Downing Street, June 24, 1790.

My dear Mother,—I cannot yet say that I am arrived at a period of much leisure, though it is comparatively something like it, and the occupation arising from the elections is diminishing fast every day. As far as we have yet any account of the returns, there have not been above three or four instances of disappointment, which are counterbalanced by success in other quarters which we hardly expected, and upon the whole I have no doubt of our being considerably stronger than in the last Parliament. We have not yet heard the event of the contest in your neighbourhood at Taunton, but

I imagine it will be favourable. Our foreign business remains still in suspense, and I hardly know what to conjecture of the probability of peace or war. In this situation I cannot venture to look with any certainty to the time when I shall be at liberty to move westward, but I hope it may not be very distant. I hope you have had your share of the true summer weather which has prevailed here for some time, and have been able to profit by it. Two or three short visits to Holwood are all that I have yet been able to accomplish. I am just setting out thither to-day with my brother, to return to the Levee to-morrow.

Ever, my dear Mother, &c., W. PITT.

In the apprehension of an impending war with Spain, Pitt was at this time deeply intent on our whole system of Foreign policy. Sometimes he saw reason to find fault with the more immediate conduct of it, as will appear from a letter as follows to the Duke of Leeds.

Saturday night, June 19, 1790.

My dear Lord,—I have just seen in the Flanders mail of yesterday Mr. Wilson's despatch of the 18th, enclosing a memorial which he had presented at Brussels, and referring to instructions from your Grace of the 8th. I do not recollect to have seen those instructions, or to have heard anything before on the subject; and I own the measure seems to me so inconsistent with the whole line we have taken respecting the Low Countries, that I fear it cannot fail to be productive of great embarrassment. I shall be glad to see the instructions of the 8th; and the materials on which they were founded will probably throw further light on the subject; but I could not avoid stating my present impression on it to you. I am, my dear Lord, &c.,

W. PITT.

During this time a gentleman of great diplomatic skill, Mr. Alleyne Fitzherbert, had been sent to Madrid to bring the negotiation to an issue. He was instructed to make every effort to settle the points in dispute, but firmly to insist on full reparation to the parties injured, before consenting even to engage in any discussion upon the abstract right. At home Pitt did not allow his anxiety for peace to relax his preparations for war. The martial energy of Chatham seemed now to be renewed in his son. A considerable land-force was raised and mustered. A powerful fleet was made ready for sea, at a vast expense and with almost unprecedented speed. Plans were formed for attacking the Spanish possessions both in the West Indies and South America. Full instructions were sent out to General O'Hara, who commanded at Gibraltar, to the Consuls of the Barbary Coast, and the Governors of the West India Islands.

Nor were our Allies forgotten. Applications were addressed both to Holland and Prussia, claiming the succours which in such cases they had bound themselves by recent treaty to afford. Both, in reply, expressed their readiness to fulfil their engagements. Not quite so satisfactory were the communications with France. There we found ourselves greeted by a Decree of the National Assembly to fit out fourteen sail of the line—these, in all probability, designed to be used against us. M. de Montmorin, then the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, protested, however, to Earl Gower, the English Ambassador, that this was only a measure of precaution; and he let fall some hints of the desire of France to act as Mediator. But the National Assembly, though cheerfully voting the supplies required for the armament, seized the opportunity to wrest from the King his prerogative of peace and war. On a Government so feeble, and a Legislature so grasping and capricious, it was impossible to place any, even the smallest, reliance. Nevertheless Mr. Pitt was anxious to pursue a most conciliatory course with both.

The views of Pitt at this time will, however, best be shown by one of his own letters, which I here subjoin. It was addressed to Mr. Hugh Elliot, the brother of Sir Gilbert and of Lady Auckland. This gentleman, who had been our Minister at Copenhagen, had gone to visit Paris of his own accord, and without any diplomatic character. As an individual holding very popular opinions, he came into frequent and familiar intercourse with the chiefs of the popular party at that time, as Mirabeau and Barnave: and he received from them strong assurances of their amicable disposition to England. This was the more important since they had formed what they called a 'Diplomatic Committee' in the National Assembly, drawing to themselves the entire conduct of Foreign Affairs. Mr. Elliot, therefore, with the sanction of Earl Gower, made known to Mr. Pitt the friendly professions which he had received; and Pitt replied to him as follows early in October, 1790:—

Dear Sir,—I am extremely glad to find by your letter that you have succeeded so well in opening a confidential intercourse with the leaders of what appears to be the ruling party in France. Great advantages may perhaps be derived from this circumstance in the present critical situation. I imagine indeed, from your account, that we can hardly hope, in case war should take place with Spain and should last for any time, that France will not ultimately take part in it.

But I think there seems to be a reasonable prospect that the persons with whom you communicate may be brought to make such representations to the Spanish Court, even if a rupture should have taken place, as may lead to a speedy restoration of peace by a settlement of the points in dispute, conformably to the principles on which we have hitherto insisted. At least it may be fairly expected that no immediate decision will be taken in France to give actual succour to Spain on the commencement of hostilities; and this point alone, if nothing more should finally be obtained, will be of great consequence, as it will give us considerable advantage in our first operations.

With respect, however, to the steps to be taken for bringing Spain to accede to our terms, great care must be taken that the French shall not appear as Mediators, still less as Arbitrators; and on this point I wait with great impatience for the more particular account which you promise to send me of Lord Gower's ideas and yours after the next interview which you were to have with the Members of the Diplomatic Committee. I am inclined to think it may be advisable that Lord Gower should be empowered, on the first news of a rupture, to communicate to the French Ministry a statement of the terms on which Mr. Fitzherbert has been instructed to insist, and of the grounds on which they are supported. If such statement should be laid by the Ministry before the Diplomatic Committee or the National Assembly, and a decree could be obtained declaring that those terms ought to be accepted by Spain, such a measure would be highly satisfactory. But I can hardly imagine that anything so decisive can be obtained unless they should be so far satisfied with our conduct as to determine not in any case to support Spain until she is willing to accede to the terms which we have proposed. Even, however, if this should happen, it is to be observed, that the war having once taken place, these terms may not appear to us sufficient unless they should be accepted by Spain within a very short period. The desire of restoring tranquillity would, in all events, incline this country to great moderation; but if the war should last any time, and our operations should have been successful, we shall hardly be expected to make peace without gaining some further advantage to compensate for our expense. This, however, must be a point wholly of subsequent consideration. If, instead of a decisive approbation of our terms, the Assembly or the Committee should approve them only in part, and should suggest any different terms which they may think reasonable, the situation will be much more delicate. Very little good can follow from such a measure, except that by the time which would probably be necessary for answers both from this country and Spain, any hostile decision on the part of France would be retarded, which I have already stated to be a considerable advantage to us. No progress, however, will be made in this way, either towards the restoration of peace (supposing a rupture to have taken place), or towards keeping France ultimately out of the war; as it must be impossible for us, at the suggestion of a third power, to recede in any point from the terms of the ultimatum we have sent to Spain.

There are two other points to which it is essential to attend in the whole of this business.

The first of these is, what seems indeed by your letter to be already fully understood, that whatever confidential communications may take place with the Diplomatic Committee for the sake of bringing them to promote our views, no ostensible intercourse can be admitted but through the medium of accredited Ministers, or the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and that in the name of the King.

The second point, which is of still more importance, is that no assurances shall be given, directly or indirectly, which go farther than that this country means to persevere in the neutrality which it has hitherto scrupulously observed with respect to the internal dissensions of France, and from which it will never depart unless the conduct held there should make it indispensable as an act of self-defence; and that we are sincerely desirous of preserving peace, and of cultivating, in general, a friendly intercourse and good understanding between the two nations. But the utmost care is necessary, under the present circumstances, to use no language which can lead to an expectation of our taking measures to forward the internal views of any political party, or of our being ripe to form any alliance between the two countries, which, even if such a thing should be really wished in France, various events might make it impossible for us to accede to, and which would, in any case, at least require great consideration. I am, with truth and regard, &c.

W. Pitt.[1]

Here are some extracts from Mr. Elliot's very long letter in reply:—

Paris, October 26, 1790.

Dear Sir,—I acquainted you in my last letter that I was to have a private conference with a Select Deputation of the Diplomatic Committee. The persons appointed to meet me were M. Menou, M. Freteau, and M. Barnave—since elected President of the National Assembly.

I shall not attempt to lay before you the speech I made to those gentlemen in the presence of the Vicomte de Noailles, who has taken an active part in favouring my progress here. But I must entreat you will not be surprised at the word speech, as nothing is to be accomplished in France without regular oratorical debate. Mine lasted about an hour. M. Barnave replied and made several objections, which I explained to his full satisfaction. It was then determined that a report of what had passed should be made to the Diplomatic Committee in pleno, and that M. Menou should let me know the result of their deliberations.

[1] This letter of Mr. Pitt has been already published in his Life by Bishop Tomline (vol. iii. p. 131), although the name of Mr. Elliot is there suppressed. He is mentioned only as 'a gentleman of considerable diplomatic experience.'

The Committee, after assembling in form, unanimously came to the resolution of waiting upon M. de Montmorin en corps, and of acquainting that Minister with their intentions. . . . M. de Montmorin agreed in the propriety of this representation, and M. Menou was deputed to tell me. . . . M. Menou executed this commission in the handsomest manner, and I consented to go to England to lay the whole state of the business before you.

In my speech to the Select Deputation I dwelt first upon the motives which had induced me to come to France. . . . That I was not sent to look for the Olive Leaf, but that I had voluntarily taken my flight for that purpose. . . . That I apprehended the religion of the National Assembly had been surprised when they passed a precipitate Decree founded upon the grossest misrepresentations concerning the British Government. Revenge for the loss of America, desire of conquest, and enmity to the promoters of the French Revolution, were supposed to be the real motives for our armaments. After combating each of these points, I established, I believe, upon the conviction of those who heard me, the probability that the Court of Spain sought for war in concert with the French malcontents.

I am also to endeavour to open the eyes of the British Government to the solidity of the French Revolution; and I add with perfect sincerity and thorough conviction that the present Government of France are, in my opinion, bent upon cultivating the most unbounded friendship with Great Britain. They will be frank and cordial in all their communications, and their object is eternal Peace and Friendship with England. If they meet with encouragement, the Commercial Treaty will be confirmed, and no obstacle be thrown in the way of settling the equilibrium of Europe upon the most liberal principles. Our conduct in the North and in the East is approved of, and will be seconded.

I have despatched this courier with Lord Gower's approbation, in order to let you know my determination of following him at twenty-four hours' distance, and of giving you the earliest notice of what has passed between me and the Committee. I shall drive from Dartford to Beckenham without going to London, and shall then meet you either at Holwood or in Downing Street, as you shall be pleased to direct by sending a letter to wait for me at Lord Auckland's.

Believe me, with infinite attachment and respect, &c.,

H. Elliot.

P.S.—I must observe that there is no such thing as a private negotiation to be carried on here. Everything like a secret is avoided as dangerous, and likely to expose those concerned to the Lanterne.

Meanwhile, at Madrid, Mr. Fitzherbert had for a long time been encountered by a downright refusal, or by new inadmissible schemes. Yet in the summer he had seemed on the very point of success. On the 24th of July the Count de Florida Blanca, as the Spanish Prime Minister, had sent to Mr. Fitzherbert a preliminary Declaration, stating that the King his master engaged to make restitution of the British vessels and property seized at Nootka Sound, and to indemnify the parties interested for the losses which they had sustained. But no sooner was the Declaration transmitted than the Spanish statesmen seemed eager to recede from its terms. The British Minister became convinced that, rather than yield, the Court of Spain was resolutely bent on war. Ere long, however, the formidable fleet, far superior to the Spanish, which we had with so much expedition made ready for sea, produced a powerful effect. Nor did the Spaniards fail to notice the doubtful prospects of the promised French alliance. Rather suddenly at last, on the 28th of October, the two Ministers signed a Convention, by which it was agreed that the lands and buildings of which British subjects had been dispossessed in North America should be restored to them; that British subjects should not be disturbed or molested in carrying on their fisheries in the South Seas, or in making settlements for the purpose of commerce on the coasts of those seas in places not already occupied; and that on the other hand the King of Britain should engage to take the most effectual measures that these fisheries should not be made a pretext for illicit trade with the Spanish settlements; and with that view it was farther stipulated that British subjects should not carry on their fisheries within ten leagues from any part of the coast already occupied by Spain.

By these means was this painful transaction, arising from a most wanton outrage, happily concluded without any actual appeal to arms. The gentlemen in Opposition might endeavour, when the Houses met again, to censure the Convention as not sufficiently definite and ample in its terms; but they certainly found no echo on either side of the Channel. In England the Parliament pronounced, and the people felt, that both the honour and the interests of the nation had been worthily maintained. On the Continent the reputation of the English Cabinet, high already, was still further exalted. We may observe Lord Auckland, at that time the ambassador at the Hague, write to Mr. Pitt as follows: —'I am convinced that if less firmness, energy, and activity had been shown on our part, or even that if our fleet had not been found in the readiest and most perfect state that has been known in the annals of Great Britain, the reparation made to us would have been incomplete. . . . . In short, there never was a business better conducted or better concluded, and there never was a moment in which our country held such pre-eminency among nations.'

The vigilant attention which Mr. Pitt gave to the conduct of our Foreign policy did not relax after the pacific arrangement with Spain. The affairs of France, and their growing influence on the affairs of England, claimed on the contrary his most earnest care.

Through the year 1790 the National Assembly continued to hold their sittings at Paris. Certainly they had abolished or reformed some grievous abuses. As certainly they had swept away some useful institutions. But besides the merit or demerit of their votes, there were many points in their deliberations to cause at the least surprise. All their favourite arguments were derived in the manner of Rousseau from what man might do, or desire to do, in his primitive condition as they assumed it to be—the wild hunting state. Of practical experience they were utterly regardless, at least until it came too late to help them. Thus their usual course was to assume instead of ascertaining facts. Even the few men of real genius, such as Mirabeau, who appeared among them at this juncture, were compelled in great measure to adopt the follies of those whom they sought to guide.

Against the doctrines then in vogue there were strong interests and also strong feelings arrayed. The chief nobles, and, as we should call them, country-gentlemen, had emigrated from the kingdom—at their head the King's youngest brother, Charles Comte d'Artois, who fixed his head-quarters at Coblentz. The most respectable members of the clergy might have acquiesced in the confiscation of their domains, but they could not brook the new Ecclesiastical Constitution which was decreed by the Assembly, and which made in fact a schism in the Church. Moneyed men were offended and alarmed at the profuse issue of assignats, the new paper circulation based upon the confiscated lands. Loyal subjects viewed with bitter anguish the danger and degradation of their King; but on the other side there was the rising ferment of the masses—of those who had little to lose and everything to gain.

In England the French Revolution had found a considerable number of friends, who caught much of its violence, and became more and more ardent as it proceeded. There were at this time among us two small bodies, which excited far more attention than their importance appears to have deserved. The first bore the name of the Constitutional Society: it had been formed some years earlier for the diffusion of useful books, but now desired to manifest its sympathy with France. The other was a club, till then of little note, which called itself the Revolution Society, and which had a yearly festival in commemoration of the events of 1688. This Society had been new-modelled and enlarged with a view to the transactions at Paris, but still retained its former name to imply a close connection between the principles of 1688 in England, and the principles of 1789 in France. On the 4th of November, 1789, it had held its anniversary meeting at the London Tavern, with Earl Stanhope in the Chair. The members then proceeded to a meeting-house in the Old Jewry, where they heard a sermon or discourse from Dr. Price, denouncing in inflammatory terms 'all supporters of slavish governments and slavish hierarchies.' Next they carried an Address of congratulation to the National Assembly, framed by Dr. Price as mover, and signed by Lord Stanhope as Chairman. This Address being in due course transmitted to Paris, was received with much enthusiasm, and acknowledged by a vote of the Assembly. Meanwhile the proceedings of the two Societies, but especially the latter, and, above all, the discourse of Dr. Price at the Old Jewry, afforded a large scope to the eloquence of Burke.

Burke, as we have already seen, took the occasion of the Army Estimates in February, 1790, to condemn in strong terms the course and tendency of the events at Paris. But feeling himself called upon to make a further effort, he began to indite a more careful composition on the same subject. The fruit of his labours appeared in October of the same year, and was entitled 'Reflections on the Revolution in France.' This masterly essay had been for some time announced, and the expectations of the public had been highly raised; but these expectations were much more than fulfilled. In his argument Burke chiefly applied himself to answer the assertions of Dr. Price, and to point out the essential difference in principle between the English and the French Revolutions. Argument, however, did not in this essay stand alone; everywhere it was enforced and adorned—sometimes, perhaps, warped and drawn aside—by the creations of a most brilliant fancy. And among the beautiful illustrations which Burke so profusely pours forth, there is none better known, or better deserving to be so, than his picture of the Queen Marie Antoinette as sixteen years before he had seen her at Versailles 'glittering like the morning star, full of life and splendour and joy; but,' he added, bitterly, 'the age of chivalry is gone; that of sophisters, economists, and calculators has succeeded; and the glory of Europe is extinguished for ever!'

It was this passage which, in an especial degree, roused the wrath of Burke's opponents. Philip Francis might flippantly ask him: 'Are you such a determined champion of beauty as to draw your sword in defence of any jade upon earth, provided she be handsome?'[1] Many others of inferior note, while carping at Burke's expression of 'the age of chivalry,' seemed never to have heard of any other knight besides Don Quixote. Thus, in hopes of assailing Burke, they borrowed, and they spoiled in borrowing, the satire of Cervantes. Others again took great exception to a subsequent phrase, where Burke expresses his alarm that 'along with its natural guardians and protectors learning will be cast into the mire, and trodden down under the hoofs of a swinish multitude.' It is plain from the context that Burke desired to speak only of such rabble as had dragged their prisoners to La Lanterne, and yelled for the blood of their Queen. But misrepresentation ever follows close in the wake of genius, and the phrase of 'a swinish multitude' was now busily held forth as the grossest of insults to the lower or the labouring classes.[2]

[2] See a note in Prior's Life of Burke, p. 319, ed. 1854.

This essay, though never offered to the public for a less price than five shillings, is said, perhaps with some exaggeration, to have reached in its sale the as yet unprecedented number of 30,000 copies. Immense certainly was the impression which it made. That impression is to be traced alike on Burke's friends and on his foes. The graduates of two great Universities (Oxford and Dublin) sent him their tokens of high respect. The French Princes at Coblentz, and the other leading men of the Royalist party, conveyed, either in messages or letters, their warmest thanks. Only a few months afterwards, when his son had gone to Brussels, and was attending an assembly at the Marquis de la Quenille's, the chief among the Emigrants at that place, he found, as he says, to his surprise, a circle gather round him with every mark of honour, while M. de la Quenille thus addressed him : 'You see, Sir, the eagerness of these gentlemen to express to you how much all good Frenchmen owe to your illustrious father.'[1] On the other hand, the partisans of the French Revolution, both abroad and at home, manifested their disappointment and vexation in every form. The essay of Burke became a favourite topic of invective with the Jacobin Club of Paris. There even the Bible itself was not more frequently scoffed at. In England the halls of debating societies resounded with orations, and the newspapers were filled with paragraphs, denouncing the great statesman as the friend of tyrants, and the champion of abuses. Many men of various merits published essays in reply, either to his speech on the Army Estimates, or to his 'Reflections.' Among these writers may be mentioned Dr. Priestley, Mr. Capel Lofft, and Lord Stanhope, and above all Mr. Mackintosh, afterwards Sir James. His work on this occasion, the Vindiciæ Gallicæ, though marked by some faults of youth and of party-spirit, gave high promise of future distinction.

[1] Correspondence of Burke, vol. iii. p. 242.

It would not be just to class any of these writers with another, though on the same subject, and at the same period—Thomas Paine. I have related in another work his first appearance in America in 1774, and his first publication in 1776, entitled 'Common Sense.' That publication had there produced a strong effect. He had been not only praised by the popular leaders, but rewarded with grants of land. But by degrees he had become better known, and of course less esteemed. Finally, finding himself fallen into obscurity, he had returned to Europe towards the year 1787. There the troubles first of Holland, and next of France, had attracted his attention. The work which he now put forth in answer to Burke was called 'The Rights of Man.' Coarse and ungrammatical in its language—as where it inveighs against 'the Quixote age of chivalry nonsense'—it was, however, commended to many readers by its bold and thorough-going tone. Thus, for example, it denounces not only rank and title, but hereditary monarchy at least, if not all monarchy, as manifest abuses.

That Mr. Burke was sometimes blinded and betrayed by his own ardent imagination—that this essay, and still more perhaps the essays that followed it, contain great exaggerations—seems to me no unfounded charge. It will come out more plainly if we compare the views of Mr. Burke in 1790 and 1791 with the views of Mr. Pitt. While condemning the excesses of the French Revolution, even at that early period, and apprehending its results, Pitt never lost the hope that among the friends of that Revolution the more moderate party might prevail. In public he held forth as the rule of his administration strict neutrality as to the internal contests; in private, he moreover sought, as we have seen through divers and not only diplomatic channels, to exchange pacific explanations with the leaders of the popular party; and he was determined to maintain against all obstacles, as long as possible, that peace so essential to the welfare of his country, and on which depended his own course of financial retrenchments and reforms. The voice of Burke, on the contrary, was for open war. Hold no intercourse with rebels! Make no terms with traitors! Appeal to neighbouring Sovereigns, and place your main reliance on the aid of foreign armies! Such was the tone of Mr. Burke even in the last months of 1790. And in consequence we find him also dissatisfied and murmuring at the line of Mr. Pitt.[1]

But does it follow, from this divergence, that we are bound to censure one or other of these two great men? Observe how different their positions at the time. Mr. Pitt was a powerful Minister, responsible for the peace of the world. Mr. Burke was an eloquent essayist, anxious above all things to rouse the spirit of the people. And in the latter point of view, if we consider Mr. Burke as addressing not merely one European nation, but all, may not even his unconscious exaggerations have been one cause of his great success? The bow had been so strongly bent in one direction, that to bring it straight again, there was need to bend it almost as strongly in the other. Against the enthusiasm of 'this new political religion,' as it is well termed by Etienne Dumont, and against the fiery zeal of its apostles, no mere cold statements of reason and duty might perhaps have sufficed. It might perhaps be requisite to evoke something of new enthusiasm, or something of old chivalry, upon the other side. Certainly it was no light crisis which could induce the writer whom I just now cited—no enemy of large reforms, but Etienne Dumont, the commentator upon Bentham — and that at no moment of heat, but many years afterwards on a calm retrospect of all the circumstances—to use these memorable words: 'It is possible that the essay of Burke may have been the salvation of Europe.'[2]

CHAPTER XIV.

Meeting of the new Parliament—Grenville created a Peer—Duke of Richmond's letter of complaint—The Budget—Trial of Hastings—Testimony of Wilberforce and Burke to Pitt's eloquence—Reappearance of Erskine in Parliament—The King offers Pitt the Garter, which he declines—Wilberforce's motion on the Slave Trade—India and Canada—Dissension between Fox and Burke—Rights of Juries—Bill in favour of Roman Catholics—Pitt's first check in foreign policy: the Russian armament—Retrospect of events in Turkey—And in Sweden.

THE meeting of the new Parliament had been fixed for the 25th of November. Previously, however, Pitt took a careful review of his position. In the Commons he had no reason to doubt his continued ascendency; but in the Lords there was a stumbling-block from the wayward temper of Thurlow. Although the Chancellor was charged, or supposed to be charged, with the conduct of the Government business in the Upper House, Mr. Pitt declared that he was never quite certain what part in debate would be taken by his Lordship. Even when he forbore from insidious opposition, he gave no real aid. During the whole Session of 1790, says his biographer, 'he never, except on one occasion, opened his mouth."[1]

Under such circumstances Pitt resolved to place among the Peers as leader some adherent on whom he could thoroughly rely. With that view he selected his cousin William Grenville, the newly-appointed Secretary of State, whom he proposed to the King to create Lord Grenville. The answer of His Majesty is dated the 21st of November. He readily agreed to the proposed arrangement, expecting, as he says, that the conciliatory temper of Mr. Grenville would aid in keeping matters smooth with the Chancellor. But His Majesty's expectations were by no means fulfilled.

Two letters of Pitt to his mother at this period are written with evident pleasure—the one announcing the pacification with Spain, and the other the peerage to Grenville.

Downing Street, Nov. 5, 1790.

My dear Mother,—I am impatient to send you as early as possible the satisfactory news which we received this morning that everything is at length settled on the subject of our disputes with Spain exactly in the manner we wished. Mr. Fitzherbert had brought the Spanish Minister to consent, on the 24th of last month, to a Convention acceding to all our terms; and it was settled that it should be signed in three days from that time. Among a thousand reasons for rejoicing in this event, it is not one of the last which occurs to me that it will give both my brother and myself a chance of still reaching Burton for a few days before the Session, and that we shall feel no mixture of anxiety in doing so. You will imagine, however, that, though our business has taken so agreeable a turn, the pressure of it is not for the moment diminished, and you will therefore not wonder at the haste of this letter. Ever, my dear Mother, &c.,

W. Pitt.

Downing Street, Nov. 24, 1790.

My dear Mother,—I have a piece of news to communicate to-day which will, I believe, be very unexpected, but not unwelcome.

It is that Grenville has just kissed hands on being removed to the House of Lords, where there are many reasons for wishing his assistance as Home Secretary of State. By the help of this arrangement, I think we shall open the new Parliament with more strength than has belonged to us since the beginning of the Government; and it is a very pleasant circumstance in the business that all parts of Government are highly satisfied with the measure, and that those who please themselves with the reports which you will see of divisions among us will find themselves completely disappointed.

You will not have wondered that I found it not so easy as I imagined and hoped to accomplish my excursion before the beginning of the Session. I must now look to the Christmas holidays, when I think myself very sure of being at liberty.

I must not add more, as I have barely had time for what I have written since coming from St. James's, and before sitting down to a formal dinner which always precedes the opening of the Session. Ever, my dear Mother, &c.,

W. PITT.

Mr. Pitt, however, was much mistaken when he thought himself able to announce 'that all parts of Government are highly satisfied with the measure.' On the same day that he wrote to Lady Chatham, the Duke of Richmond wrote to him. That letter of complaint—very able and very angry—I shall here insert at length.

Goodwood, Nov. 24, 1790.

My dear Sir,—I cannot but very much regret that Mr. Grenville's being called up to the House of Lords appeared to you to press for such an immediate decision as to prevent the wish you had of conversing with me upon the subject from taking place, because I should at least have had an opportunity of previously giving you my most serious advice not to adopt a plan which to me seems likely to be attended with many bad consequences.

I must conclude from your letter as well as from all the circumstances attending this measure, that it will have been carried into execution before my answer can reach you. But I will take my chance of the possibility of a delay, and state to you fairly some of the principal objections that strike me.

In the first place, I think it ruin to Mr. Grenville. He has in the space of a very few years gone through many great offices, and now holds the second political situation in the House of Commons. In case of any accident happening to you or your brother, he would naturally become the first servant of the Crown in that House; and the circumstances of the times, joined to his own abilities, justify, in the eyes of the public, his being where he is. But, by removing him from the House of Commons, you deprive him of all the prospects of future advantages which talents can make their way to in that place. He now stands in every light in an advantageous situation both for himself and for his friends: is it then wise to risk a change? He has succeeded admirably well hitherto; but it may be very uncertain whether he will succeed so well in another situation, certainly a very different one from that which he is now in. To call up a younger brother to the House of Peers for the evident purpose of giving him the lead there, is a degree of reflection upon the whole House of Lords that there is no one there fit for such a situation, which will be felt, and may cause him to fail in that for which alone you place him there.

If this should be the case, or by any other means a change happen, a Lord Grenville without a fortune would be but a poor situation!

But of all this, to be sure, Mr. Grenville must be the best judge; and I must suppose that he likes the risking all this for the sake of being made a Peer and having the lead in the House of Lords, rather than remain second in the House of Commons. For whatever his attachment may be to you, no man with that laudable degree of ambition which Mr. Grenville has, can be supposed to hazard such an entire political sacrifice of himself as he is exposing himself to without he saw some considerable gratification to himself in so doing. But the wisest men have their weaknesses, and I fear this is a very fatal one in Mr. Grenville. However, since it is his choice, there is nothing more to be said upon his account; but on your account and that of the permanency of the present Government, in which the King's happiness and the prosperity of the kingdom are, I think, deeply interested, I do apprehend the worst consequences.

It would be inconsistent with the friendship I trust I have upon all occasions shown you, and with the fairness I will always act with, not to say that I believe this country will not be satisfied to see you two younger brothers take the lead of the two Houses of Parliament, and by yourselves govern the country. With your abilities—which, without a compliment, are very transcending—you may take that lead in the House of Commons; but Mr. Grenville, whose parts, however solid and useful, are certainly not upon a level with yours, cannot, as I conceive, succeed in taking the lead in the House of Lords, where something of higher rank and more fortune and dignity is required; and I do apprehend that both of you being in such situations, so nearly related with Lord Chatham at the Admiralty, will be thought engrossing too much in one family. You will consider, too, that at the same time that you deprive yourself of Mr. Grenville's support and that of a Cabinet Minister in the House of Commons, which was the reason for which you made him Secretary of State, and thereby remain almost singly there as to speakers of any weight, you will place Mr. Grenville as singly in the House of Lords. The Duke of Leeds, who never took a very active part in debates, will probably not be very desirous of standing forward when he is so evidently set aside. Lord Chatham has never yet spoken. Lord Camden is idle, and grows old. Lord Stafford will seldom speak, and but a few words. Your account of the Chancellor makes it more likely that he will be adverse than otherwise; and as to myself, I must confess that I do not see how I can be of any use. It is not, therefore, from your Cabinet that Mr. Grenville can derive much support, and I do not imagine that Lord Hawkesbury will feel much disposed to act under him. There remains Lord Walsingham, and the chance of what the Duke of Montrose may turn out as a speaker in the House of Lords.

This against the present speakers in Opposition, and possibly the Chancellor, will form but a poor line of debaters to defend the errors of Government that, from the present way of carrying on business, unavoidably arise, and which it falls to the lot of the House of Lords to be afterwards obliged to support.

I have said that I could be of little use; perhaps in no situation could I have been of much; but to be of any as a speaker, a man must feel something for himself, and not appear to the world in an unbecoming situation. I trust I have not shown myself a difficult man when, after having had for many years a considerable share in the debates in the House of Lords, I first wished to support your Government as an individual, and afterwards defended your measures as a Minister under Lord Sydney and the Duke of Leeds. But to continue to act a second part under every change, and particularly under one which is avowedly made for the sole purpose of giving the House of Lords another leader, would be depriving myself of every sort of consideration which I may hope to have in that House, and rendering myself totally useless there.

I must say, too, that, after having been of late so particularly called upon to take a very active part in a business of some consequence where it was thought I could be useful, and having shown a disposition to accommodate, as far as it was possible, my situation to your wishes, I cannot but feel myself somewhat neglected by your deciding upon this measure without my consent or even knowledge; for when we conversed on this subject some time ago, I had expressed my objections to it, and afterwards understood you had entirely dropped the idea. You will also recollect my having often expressed that, although I feel very little interest in the disposal of employments or the making of Peers, yet I could not think it right that your colleagues of the Cabinet should never hear of what is doing in these respects till the things were done. Those with whom I have formerly been connected in politics and in friendship used to treat me with more attention; and, indifferent as I am upon those subjects in general, I cannot be entirely so when they tend to prevent me from being of that use, though small, which otherwise I might possibly be of in the House of Lords to the King's administration of which I have the honour to form a part.

If I had any political ambition, I might feel disappointed and hurt at such a conduct; but having none, it only adds to that desire of retiring from public business which you know I have long had in view. In so doing I shall endeavour not to give it the appearance of any dissatisfaction with you, for in truth I feel none, believing, as I do, that your conduct does not proceed from any intentional want of kindness towards me, but from (you must forgive me for saying so) an idleness in your disposition that too often makes you neglect to cultivate the friendship of those who are most attached to you, and which makes you expose your judgment to be biassed by the opinion of the narrow circle to which you confine your intimacy.

I have before observed that I think Mr. Grenville must have some strong predilection for this measure, and perhaps Mr. Dundas, whom you mention to have had some concern, at least in what has led to it, may not be sorry to have Mr. Grenville out of his way in the House of Commons. The hurry and manner in which this business was conducted, not allowing twelve hours for the return of your messenger, lead me to these suspicions; and, as the French say, I doubt your religion and good sense have been surprised. But of all things this is a measure the least calculated to conciliate the Chancellor, who is not fond of Mr. Grenville, and who, with some reason, will think he ought to have been consulted as to the person who is to have the lead in the House of Lords. But perhaps Mr. Grenville and Mr. Dundas, who know that the Chancellor does not like either of them, may not be sorry to force him out. I wish this may not end in breaking up that administration on which they both depend.

With every sincere wish for your prosperity,
I am, my dear Sir, &c., RICHMOND.

Commencing in November, 1790, and closing in June, 1791, the first Session of the New Parliament comprised many important debates. Within three weeks of the meeting Pitt brought forward his Budget for the year. It was no longer like his Budget of the 19th of April last, a picture of unmixed prosperity. Then he might express his satisfaction that the average income of the country for the last two years, amounting to sixteen millions and a quarter, had exceeded his own estimate which the Opposition had formerly censured as too high. He might point out that, since 1786, various extraordinary expenses beyond the regular peace establishment, and calculated at six millions, had been defrayed with the assistance of a loan of only one million, while within that period more than five millions of the National Debt had been paid off. 'The country at this moment,' Mr. Pitt might then conclude, 'is in a state of prosperity far greater than at any period, even the most flourishing, before the late war; and this I can incontestably prove from a comparative view of the exports and imports of that period compared with those of the present'—so fully and so rapidly had the loss of the American colonies, deemed irreparable by all our wisest statesmen, been repaired.

Such, then, was the picture which the Prime Minister could draw in April, 1790. But in the December following he had the more painful task of computing and providing for the expense of the recent armament. All included it came to no less a sum than 3,133,000*l.* Mr. Pitt, relying, as he justly might, on the buoyancy of the national resources, determined that this sum should not remain as a permanent addition to the national debt. Accordingly he had framed a scheme for paying off the whole, principal and interest, within four years by the aid of temporary taxes. He proposed new duties, some to endure four years and others only two, upon spirits, sugar, malt, and other articles. He also desired that the public should for the first time derive some advantage from the large balance of unclaimed dividends remaining at the Bank of England. In 1727 that balance had been only 43,000*l.*; in October, 1790, it had grown to 660,000*l.* Surely, said Mr. Pitt, it would be fair and right to apply half a million of this balance towards the discharge of the debts incurred by the late armament, making the Consolidated Fund answerable for those dividends if at any time they should be claimed. By this measure the nation would obtain the immediate use of half a million without interest, while the security of the national creditor would be in no degree lessened or impaired.

This scheme, which was unfolded by Pitt in a luminous speech, was received with general assent, excepting only the proposal as to the unclaimed dividends. Fears were expressed lest it should 'give a stab to public credit'—lest the fundholders, neglecting to inform themselves, should suppose their security lessened. Finally it was arranged that, instead of the Government taking directly any proportion of the unclaimed dividends, the Bank Directors should lend half a million without interest, thus giving to the public exactly the same advantage as the first scheme contemplated.

The trial of Hastings was another subject which gave rise to long debates. Here the question raised was whether in law and form the dissolution of Parliament put an end to an impeachment before the House of Lords. On this point the lawyers might revel in a long array of doubtful precedents. And among themselves the best opinions were much divided. As against the Abatement might be cited the great names of Camden and Mansfield ; as for it names of scarcely inferior legal eminence, Thurlow and Kenyon. But while the heads of the law were thus at issue, there was much more of unanimity among the leading statesmen ; for while Fox and Burke, and Sheridan and Grey eagerly pressed forward the Impeachment, Pitt and Dundas in long and argumentative speeches threw their weight into the same scale.

The speech of Pitt on this occasion is commemorated by Wilberforce with high praise. 'This was almost the finest speech Pitt ever delivered. It was one which you would say at once he never could have made if he had not been a mathematician. He put things by as he proceeded, and then returned to the very point from which he had started with the most astonishing clearness.'[1]

Burke also was greatly pleased with this speech. 'Sir,' he said, 'the Right Hon. gentleman and I have often been opposed to one another, but his speech to-night has neutralized my opposition; nay, Sir, he has dulcified me.'

Erskine, who had now returned to Parliament as member for Portsmouth, espoused with vehemence, and in opposition to all his friends, the side of the Abatement. His long speech on this occasion appears to have borne no traces of his wonderful genius at the Bar. He acknowledged that in these debates he did not feel 'at home;' and he drew down upon himself some biting taunts from Burke. 'The learned gentleman,' said Burke, 'has declared himself nervous, and has modestly declined all claim to eloquence. Why should the learned gentleman decline that to which all the world allows him entitled, and to which alone he has had recourse in the present debate? It is plain he trusted in that, and in that only. He confesses that he has not examined the Journals of the House of Commons; and is pleased to assert that he had no access to those of the other House, which nevertheless are printed and accessible to the whole world. He only produced in his hand a pamphlet, to whose contents if he trusted to supply him with argument, it is not easy to see on what he could possibly rely except his own eloquence. . . . . For my part I must own that I wish the country to be governed by law, but not by lawyers!' [1]

Thus did Erskine recommence his career in Parliament—certainly under no favourable auspices. He continued in the following years to speak on various subjects, but seldom with any success. And while thus by his Parliamentary exertions he could render little service to his friends in public life, he was further apt to wear out their patience, even in private converse, by his most garrulous though ever good-humoured vanity. 'Recollect'—thus writes Fox to Grey—'the impossibility when Erskine was in his most talkative vein of anything like deliberation.' [2] Still far more contemptuous is the character drawn of him by Fox's nephew and Erskine's own Cabinet colleague. 'He talked much nonsense:' this is among the smaller imputations which Lord Holland conveys.[3]

So far as regards the subject of the Non-Abatement in December, 1790, the unexpected aid of Erskine to the friends of Hastings had no effect. The union of all the great statesmen in the House of Commons prevailed; and the continuance of the trial was voted by overwhelming numbers.

There were also before Christmas and in both Houses long debates on the recent Convention with Spain. Addresses in approval of it were carried by very large majorities—in the Peers by 73 votes against 30, and in the Commons by 247 against 123. So much time was taken up in these manifold discussions that the early part of the Session continued till the 29th of December. Then the Houses adjourned till the beginning of February. Then also Pitt set off on a visit to Burton Pynsent.

By the votes of both Houses the Spanish affair was now successfully concluded. For his part in the negotiation Mr. Fitzherbert was raised to the Irish peerage as Lord St. Helens: he survived till 1839. A more splendid reward was designed for Mr. Pitt. The King had for some time past desired to invest him with the Garter; and he renewed the offer of it on this occasion. But it was respectfully declined by the Minister—the only instance, so far as I know, since the Revolution, besides that of Sir Robert Peel, in which a Commoner has been offered and has refused this prize; and a striking contrast to the eagerness with which it often has been sought and solicited by many great Peers. Pitt, however, obtained the Royal permission to bestow it on his brother, Lord Chatham.[1]

On the assembling of the Houses in February the Trial of Hastings did not, as was hoped, make any rapid progress. The Lords were very deliberate in deciding the point of Non-Abatement. On receiving a communication from the other House, they appointed in the first place a Committee to search for precedents; a favourite course with both Houses, especially, perhaps, when it is known that no precedents at all are to be found. It was not till the 16th of May that Lord Porchester moved and carried by a large majority a Resolution as follows:—'That a Message be sent to acquaint the Commons that this House is ready to proceed in the Trial of Warren Hastings.'

Even thus, so far as regarded any active progress in the Trial, the whole, or nearly the whole, of this Session was already consumed. Nor could it fail to be noticed that the hearing of only three out of the twenty Charges sent up to the House of Lords had taken up three years. At that rate, and allowing also a proportionate time for the defence, scarcely one of the promoters of the first Impeachment would have survived to see its termination. Under these circumstances Mr. Burke on the 14th of February brought forward a motion to limit the prosecution to a single Charge more, namely, that relating to contracts, pensions, and allowances. The motion was opposed by Major Scott and other partisans of Hastings, whose desire was to bring the Trial to an immediate close; but it obtained the support of Mr. Pitt, and was carried by an immense majority. The hopes of the Managers were once again revived. It was thought that the ardour of politics might—as sometimes, though rarely happens—overcome the slowness of the law.

Of late the steps for the abolition of the Slave Trade had been almost as tardy as those for the Trial of Hastings. The whole of the preceding and a great part of the present Session had been taken up in the examination of witnesses, which Mr. Wilberforce could not prevent, which he indeed desired, but which in its result served only to perplex and overlay the question. Under cover of these conflicting testimonies, Members of Parliament found themselves much freer than before to vote as the interests of the Liverpool merchants or of the Jamaica planters might incline them. There were other discouragements also. The extravagances of the Jacobin Club at Paris, and of Thomas Paine in his 'Rights of Man,' were insidiously ascribed to the friends of Abolition by its enemies. With better reason might they point to the rising ferment of the West India slaves—to the revolution which had already commenced in St. Domingo, and was marked by horrible reprisals of the Blacks against the Whites.[1]

It was under such unfavourable circumstances that Mr. Wilberforce on the 18th of April moved for leave to bring in a Bill to prevent the further importation of slaves into the British Colonies in the West Indies. The debate lasted two days. Pitt and Fox, for once on the same side, put forth all their powers. Nor was it wholly without effect even so far as the immediate numbers were concerned. Two young Members of Parliament—Mr. John Thomas Stanley, afterwards Lord Stanley of Alderley, and Mr. Dudley Ryder, afterwards Earl of Harrowby—declared, much to their honour, that they had hitherto been adverse or in doubt as regarded the Abolition of Slavery, but should now give hearty votes in its favour. On the whole, however, the majority against it was immense; the Noes being 163, and the Yeas but 88.

Both India and Canada were in this Session subjects of debate. In 1790 Lord Cornwallis had found it necessary to declare war against Tippoo, Sultan of Mysore. During that year General Medows at the head of 15,000 men gained several advantages. But early in 1791 Lord Cornwallis took the field in person. He besieged and took the town and fort of Bangalore, the second place in importance of Tippoo's kingdom; and pursuing his march until near the outworks of the first, Seringapatam, he there gained a victory over Tippoo himself. But he did not consider his force sufficient to reduce the capital, defended as it was by extensive fortifications; and thus the conclusion of the war was reserved for another campaign.

In the House of Commons, and in February, 1791, Philip Francis brought forward some Resolutions tending to a censure of the war. They were opposed by Dundas and Pitt, and rejected without a division. Not satisfied with this negative victory, Dundas two days afterwards moved, without making a single preliminary observation, other Resolutions in approval of the war. Fox and Francis made some angry speeches, but did not venture to divide.

A Bill for the better government of Canada was brought forward by Mr. Pitt. Since the conquest of 1759, and still more since the Act of 1774, there had been great and growing differences between the new English settlers and the old French inhabitants; the latter in general stationed at or near Quebec, while the former, for the most part, proceeded higher up the stream. It was now proposed to divide the province into two parts, under the denominations of Upper and Lower Canada; the Upper for the English and American settlers, the Lower for the French Canadians, and with a local legislature to each part. 'This division,' said Pitt, 'could, I hope, be made in such a manner as to give each a great majority in their own particular share, although it cannot be expected to draw a line of complete separation. Any inconveniences to be apprehended from ancient Canadians being included in the one, or British settlers in the other, would be remedied by the double legislature which I seek to establish, by appointing in each a House of Assembly, and a Council, so as to give them the full advantages of the British Constitution. . . . If the province were not to be divided, there would be only one House of Assembly; and there being two parties, if these parties had been equal, or nearly equal, in the Assembly, it would have been the source of perpetual faction; while if one party had been much stronger than the other, the minority might not without some justice call itself oppressed.'[1]

Besides this division of the province, which might be regarded as the main feature of the scheme, there were other clauses providing that the descendants of those on whom the King might bestow hereditary titles should hold hereditary seats in the Council, and that there should be a permanent appropriation of lands for the maintenance of the Protestant Clergy. To the first introduction of this measure Fox offered no resistance. And there fell from him on this occasion a maxim which has of late become almost a settled rule in our Colonial government, but which, in 1791, it required both discernment to perceive and courage to avow. 'I do not hesitate to say,' said Fox, 'that if a local legislature be liberally formed, that circumstance would much incline me to overlook defects in the other regulations; because I am convinced that the only method of retaining distant Colonies with advantage is to enable them to govern themselves.'

It was not till after the Committee that the opposition of Fox began. With his usual powers of eloquence, he pointed out some strong objections to the scheme of Clergy Reserves; and while lauding the principle of aristocracy in the government of England, denied that it was applicable to the government of Canada. Notwithstanding his arguments, the Bill—like most other Bills opposed by Fox at this juncture—was carried with little alteration through both Houses. But it is worthy of note that one argument of Fox, though not allowed in theory, has prevailed in practice. For although the Bill did enable the Sovereign to grant hereditary honours in the province of Canada, not one such hereditary honour was in fact conferred.

The progress of this Bill, however, was fraught with an interest far beyond its own. It was made memorable by a collateral incident which it produced—by the utter breach and lasting estrangement of the two great leaders of the Opposition ranks.

In arguing against the Canada Bill, Fox had not scrupled to draw some illustrations from the recent changes in France; nor had he forborne from some reflections—or what seemed so—on the recent writings of Burke. A debate on a different subject, to which I shall presently come, the Russian armament, had given Fox another opportunity for going over the same ground. On this second occasion, Burke, who was not present on the first, had risen with signs of strong emotion; but the hour being late, and the House exhausted, he was stopped by loud cries of 'Question!' chiefly from the friends of Fox. At a later period Fox is known to have regretted the injudicious zeal of those who would not allow Burke to answer his remarks upon the spot. 'The contention,' he said, 'might have been fiercer and hotter, but the remembrance of it would not have settled so deep and rankled so long.'

It is however certain, though Fox's ill-wishers might sometimes maintain the contrary, that Fox had no intention to insult or wound his friend. On the contrary, he appears to have regretted that the ardour of debate had hurried him too far. On the day that had been fixed for the re-commitment of the Canada Bill, he, in company with a common friend, paid a visit to Burke. Something of their old cordiality seemed to revive between them. A political circumstance of great delicacy was mentioned and discussed—a report, namely, that the King had let fall some expressions favourable to Mr. Fox. Burke made no secret of the topics which he designed to use for his own defence in the House of Commons; and Fox expressed the wish that at least the discussion might not take place on the re-commitment of the Canada Bill; but Burke declared that he could not consent to forego an opportunity which he could not hope to find again in any other business then before Parliament, or likely to come before it. Notwithstanding this refusal no present breach of friendship ensued. At the close of their conversation the two statesmen walked to Westminster together, and together entered the House. It was the last time in their lives that they were thus arm in arm or hand in hand.[1]

On entering the House of Commons the two statesmen found that Sheridan had, in the mean time, moved the adjournment of the discussion until after the Easter holidays, to which Pitt had agreed. Both Fox and Burke said a few words, the latter announcing that at the next opportunity, that is on the 6th of May, he should be prepared to explain himself fully on the affairs of France.

On the 6th of May accordingly the expectation of the House was wound up to the highest pitch. But by that time the friends of Fox had discovered that it was highly irregular and blameable to foist reflections upon France into debates upon Canada. This irregularity, which had not struck them while the practice was continued by Fox, appeared to them in the strongest light the moment a reply was announced by Burke. When, therefore, on the 6th of May, Burke rose in his place, and was proceeding with solemn earnestness to inveigh against the error and evil of the French Revolution, there appeared a fixed design to interrupt him. Member after Member from his own, the Opposition side, started up to call him to Order. First, there was Mr. Baker, a country gentleman of considerable note, from Hertfordshire. Next came a Member who also took some part in the debates, Mr. Michael Angelo Taylor. Others of the rank and file followed, and a tumultuous scene ensued. There was, as Burke said, a most disorderly rage for Order. When, at last, he was suffered in some measure to proceed, chafed and goaded as he had been, and even at length by Fox among the rest, he, no doubt, spoke against 'the Right Hon. gentleman' (for now he dropped the name of friend) much more bitterly and strongly than he had at first designed. 'Certainly,' he said, 'it is indiscreet at any period, but especially at my time of life, to provoke enemies, or give my friends occasion to desert me. Yet, if my firm and steady adherence to the British Constitution place me in such a dilemma, I am ready to risk all, and with my last words to exclaim—"Fly from the French Constitution!"' Fox here whispered across to him that there was no loss of friends. 'Yes,' rejoined Burke; 'yes, there is a loss of friends. I know the price of my conduct. I have done my duty at the price of my friend. Our friendship is at an end.'

[1] In my account of this transaction I have closely followed a passage in the Annual Register for 1791 (pp. 114-118), which was certainly drawn up under Burke's direction, and perhaps in some part even by Burke himself.

When Burke, after some further impassioned bursts of eloquence, had sat down, Fox rose to reply. But his mind was so painfully affected by what had passed, that for some minutes he was unable to proceed. Tears rolled down his cheeks, and he strove in vain to give utterance to his thoughts. The whole House seemed to sympathise with this generous gush of feeling, and many eyes were moistened besides his own.[1] Recovering himself at last, he adverted with manly and becoming tenderness to the Right Hon. gentleman so lately his familiar friend. He repeated what he had said in the preceding year, that he had learned more from Mr. Burke than from all books and all other men put together. All his political knowledge was derived from Mr. Burke's writings, speeches, or familiar conversation, and his severance from a man to whom he owed so many obligations would be painful to him to the last hour of his life. Still, however, he was bound to avow his opinions on public affairs, and he must look upon the French Constitution as a most stupendous and glorious fabric of liberty. The old despotism was annihilated; the new system had the good of the people for its object; and that was the point on which he took his stand.

Still untired, Burke rose again and spoke once more with augmented vehemence, denouncing the new French Constitution as no stupendous or glorious fabric, but rather 'as a building composed of untempered mortar—as the work of Goths and Vandals, where everything was disjointed and inverted.' Fox made yet another short reply, and thus the discussion ended. And thus ended also a friendship of twenty-five years—a friendship fraught with great results on the politics of England, and renowned throughout the world—a friendship which the Revolution in America cemented, and the Revolution of France broke asunder.

In this memorable quarrel, which had been for some time foreseen as impending, there were many of the Whigs disposed in secret to sympathise with Burke. Such, for example, was the tendency of the Duke of Portland, in former years their nominal Prime Minister. But all of them, from the highest to the lowest, felt a natural repugnance to break with their real chief. So long as they could, they had laboured to urge that the difference between Burke and Fox was speculative only—that Burke might well leave the allusions of Fox and Sheridan without reply—and that there was nothing to prevent their continued concurrence in the field of practical action. When at last the breach did come, all, or nearly all, the Whig Members of Parliament, always excepting Windham, espoused the side of Fox. And, as commonly happens in parties, though there might be some hesitation in deciding, yet, when the decision was taken, they rushed at once into an angry extreme. I have already related their insulting, and, as it were, systematic interruptions of Burke on the 6th of May. Within the week a significant hint was conveyed him in the columns of a Whig newspaper, that he was expected to retire from the House of Commons.[1] Thus far then Burke remained almost alone. Even at the close of this summer no immediate effect appears to have been produced by his masterly tract 'An Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs.' But the progress of affairs in France was surely, though slowly, working in his favour. Month after month during the next two years the news that came from across the Channel tended more and more to fulfil his predictions, and to falsify the hopes of Fox. And thus, as will be shown hereafter, a great majority of his former friends ended by coming round to his declared opinions.

But menawhile the isolation of Burke in public life manifested in the clearest manner how high and honourable were the motives by which he was swayed. For it is to be observed, so far as the contending parties in England were concerned, that in losing old friends, he had by no means acquired new. He had indeed, from time to time, some communications with the Ministry on business connected with the French Emigrants. But these communications were on both sides cold and ungenial. Mr. Burke sought no junction upon other points with the party that he had so long opposed. On the other hand, Mr. Pitt at this period appears to have regarded the vehemence of Mr. Burke against the rulers of France as unsafe and extreme. When appealed to in the debates of the House of Commons, the Prime Minister, while commending the patriotic spirit of Burke, had advised him rather to extol the English Constitution than to attack the French.[2] Therefore, in the course which he had chosen, Burke went on alone. He might justly feel at this juncture that he had sacrificed for conscience sake not merely any ambitious views of his own, but what was far dearer to him, the ambitious views of his son and only child. He might justly write as follows to one of the French gentlemen in England, an agent from the Princes at Coblentz: 'In the disinterested part we actively take in your affairs, we want no apology to any human creature. We have made many enemies here, and no friends, by the part we have taken. We have, for your sakes, mixed with those with whom we have had no natural intercourse. We have quitted our business; we have broken in upon our engagements. For one mortification you have endured, we have endured twenty. My son has crossed land and sea with much trouble, and at an expense above his means. But the cause of humanity requires it; he does not murmur; and is ready to do as much and more for men whose faces he has not seen.' [1]

The limits to the rights of Juries, and the statements of Judges in reference to them, had of late years attracted some attention. In 1784 there was the trial of Dr. William Shipley, Dean of St. Asaph, on the charge of publishing a libel which was written by Sir William Jones, and entitled 'A Dialogue between a Gentleman and a Farmer;' and the verdict in this case had been 'Guilty of publishing, but whether a libel or not the Jury do not find.' In 1789 there was, as we have seen, the trial of John Stockdale, when the Jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty. In 1790 there was the prosecution of John Luxford, printer of the 'Morning Herald,' for a paragraph tending to embroil us with our nearest neighbours, since it boldly asserted that in the armament resulting from the affair at Nootka Sound, the Ministers had in view not an open contest with Spain, but rather a treacherous attack on France. Here the defendant pleaded Guilty, and was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment.

In such cases, the Judge, when he had to charge the Jury, was wont to rely mainly on a solemn declaration from the Court of King's Bench as presided over by the Earl of Mansfield, and as called forth by the ambiguous verdict in Dean Shipley's trial. In this argument Lord Mansfield had clearly laid down the position that the Juries were to decide the fact and not the law—whether the defendant had or had not published the pamphlet, and not whether the pamphlet was or was not a libel. When in 1788 Mansfield had retired from the Bench full of years and honours, his decisions continued to be cited with deserved respect. Nor indeed was it alleged by men of weight that he had failed to lay down the law correctly according to the latest precedents. In May 1791 even Erskine, keen as he was for the rights of Juries, acknowledged in the House of Commons that if he were called to fill a judicial office, he should find it difficult on this subject to resist the current of decisions.

The Juries on their part were by no means always inclined to acquiesce in this limitation of their right, and it seemed most desirable that all doubts should be removed, and that they should obtain beyond dispute the full powers that they claimed. Twenty years before Burke had framed a Bill for that purpose. The subject was now resumed by Fox, who moved for leave to introduce his measure on the 20th of May, and who received on that occasion the cordial support of Pitt. But Fox had stirred too late in the Session for immediate success. Though the Bill was carried through the Commons with all possible despatch, the Second Reading could not be moved by Earl Stanhope in the Lords until the 8th of June, the Prorogation being designed for the 10th; and the Chancellor might therefore safely and on sufficient grounds gratify his dislike of the measure by moving and obtaining its rejection for this year.

There was another subject this Session on which Pitt and Fox concurred. Mr. John Mitford, a lawyer of eminence, and afterwards the first Lord Redesdale, produced a Bill in favour of the Roman Catholics. His object, as he explained it, was by no means to enable them to sit in Parliament or to fill any office from which they were before excluded, but to provide that such among them as should take an oath prescribed by the Bill should be exempted from some of the severe penalties which at various times since the Reformation had been passed against them. These penalties—a most just reproach to the age and race by which they were enacted—were so many that the mere enumeration of them in Burn's work on Ecclesiastical Law took up seventy pages. Pitt declared himself friendly to the measure, and Fox only complained that it did not go far enough. The relief, he said, ought to extend to every Roman Catholic, and not to the oath-takers alone. In the same spirit Pitt expressed an earnest wish that the obnoxious Statutes might be not only suspended, but repealed. Meanwhile, however, the Bill of Mr. Mitford was carried through the Commons unopposed, and in the Lords was supported by the Primate and the Bench of Bishops, the Chancellor on that day being absent from illness. And thus, with some amendments, the measure passed into law.

It may well be supposed that the Roman Catholics—and above all with such weighty opinions on their side—did not deem this concession final and conclusive, but desired to press their further claims. A Committee had been formed, and was sitting at Dublin, with a view to legislative action on their behalf in both kingdoms, and as Secretary they had chosen Richard Burke, the son of the great philosopher and statesman.

Up to this time I have shown the Prime Minister triumphant in nearly all his measures, and upheld in every contest by the public approbation and applause. We are now to contemplate almost the first check to that lofty will, almost the first cloud upon that brilliant sky, in the ill reception of his scheme for the Russian armament. But here a retrospect will be required.

The views entertained with respect to the rising empire of Russia had greatly varied in England within sixty years, even among those statesmen who agreed on other questions. Thus, in 1719, the policy of Stanhope, at that time Prime Minister, had been defined 'to drive the Muscovites as far off as possible.' On the other hand, we find in 1773 Chatham write to Shelburne: 'Your Lordship knows I am quite a Russ.' Of these two opinions, as time proceeded, Pitt certainly inclined to the former. And he watched with anxiety the progress of the war, commencing in August, 1787, which the Court of Petersburg had haughtily provoked, and the Porte imprudently declared.

Even at the outset of these hostilities the Empress Catherine felt secure of a powerful ally. She had recently met, on a journey to the Crimea, her brother Emperor Joseph the Second; they had travelled for the most part in the same carriage, exchanged many compliments, and discussed many schemes of conquest.[1] And among these stood foremost the destruction, or at least the dismemberment, of the Ottoman empire. Joseph the Second, with many good and some great qualities, was misled by an inconsiderate desire of rivalling Frederick the Great. Thirsting for military fame, and careless of political consequences, he issued a Declaration of War against Turkey in February, 1788. His Manifesto on that occasion required some skill to draw, since in truth he had not the smallest grievance against the Sultan to allege, and could only plead his wish to succour his good friend the Czarina.

But the result to the Emperor, when he appeared at the head of his soldiers, by no means corresponded with his hopes. He had collected an army of 200,000 men, the largest perhaps that the House of Austria had yet brought into the field, but it was unskilfully distributed along the whole line of the Turkish frontier. One main body, under the Prince of Coburg, was designed to co-operate with the Russians in Moldavia; another, under Joseph himself, moved along the Save. At the head of this last force, from which such great things had been expected, Joseph might indeed reduce the petty border fortress of Sabacz, but he could not prevent the Grand Vizier from invading and laying waste the Bannat of Temeswar. He found it necessary to order a retreat, which was made in haste and ill-conducted, and at the close of the year he came back to Vienna sick in body and dejected in mind.

Catherine the Second had entrusted the principal direction of the war to her favourite, Prince Potemkin. Under him Count Romanzow commanded the army on the Pruth. Under him the Prince de Nassau-Siegen, with whom the adventurer Paul Jones had taken service, commanded the flotilla in the Euxine. The Turks, on their part, relied on their formidable fleet of eighteen ships of the line, and on their renowned Capitan Pacha Hassan, the hero of Lemnos. Hassan did indeed display all his former daring, not quenched by the snows of fourscore years, but there was neither skill nor discipline in most of his officers or men. In the autumn of 1788 his armament was first repulsed by Paul Jones at Gluboka, then all but annihilated at Kinburn by Jones and Siegen united. Emboldened by this success, Prince Potemkin proceeded to invest the important fortress of Ockzakow.

Turning from the Euxine to the Baltic, there appeared to the Turkish side a wholly unexpected ally. Gustavus of Sweden was, through his mother Ulrica, nephew to the great King of Prussia, and like the Emperor Joseph he felt a perilous ambition to rival that consummate master of the art of war. He had as little plea for assailing Russia as Joseph for assailing Turkey; nevertheless he published a Manifesto in the summer of 1788, and at once commenced hostilities. On proceeding to put himself at the head of his forces in Finland, the parallel with Joseph might be still further continued, for he encountered nothing but discomfiture. Admiral Greig, a Scotchman in the Russians' service, and commanding their Baltic fleet, proved an overmatch to the Swedish. The principal officers and nobles of Gustavus were disaffected to him from the violent subversion of their privileges which he had made in former years, and the Danes, at the instigation of Catherine, suddenly assailed his dominions on their side. It became necessary for him to return from Finland in all haste, and oppose himself to these new adversaries. The King of Sweden was then beyond all doubt in a most critical position, and he owed his deliverance only to the active measures of Pitt.

The object of Pitt, whether in the north or south, was the same—to uphold the balance of power. For this object he had just concluded and he relied upon treaties of alliance with Holland and Prussia. He now desired that the three Allies should by a joint Remonstrance arrest the progress of the Danes and Russians and save Sweden. It was no easy matter on this occasion to overcome the conscientious scruple of George the Third, who apprehended any risk of war. It was no easy matter on this occasion or on any other to animate the indolent temper of Frederick William. But the requisite sanction at least for the first steps being granted, Mr. Hugh Elliot, our Minister at Copenhagen, received the desired instructions. Without losing a moment he crossed over into Sweden and hastened to the camp of the Danish army before Gothenburg. There he met the young Prince Royal, nephew of George the Third, and virtual Regent of Denmark through his father's incapacity. To him Mr. Elliot at once presented a Remonstrance in the name of the three Allies, threatening him with their resentment if the war with Sweden were further pursued. Under this pressure a preliminary truce was signed on the 9th of October, first for only a week, and at the close of that period for a month.

The aim of Pitt was now to carry out this policy to its full extent—to bring the Danes from a preliminary to a final pacification. Here again there were some conscientious difficulties on the part of George the Third, over whom the shadow of his great malady was just beginning to be cast. My readers may themselves consult the King's touching letter of October 25, Mr. Pitt's answer offering some modification, and the King's rejoinder of November 3, 1788. The result was in complete accordance with the wishes and the expectations of the British Minister. England, without incurring any warfare of her own, arrested the warfare of another Power. The Danes marched back their troops to Norway, and subsequently were persuaded to resume their position as neutrals in the war.

On the side of Turkey the armies had for the most part withdrawn to winter quarters. But the investment of Ockzakow was still continued by Prince Potemkin. The Turks, well aware of the importance of this post, had thrown into it a garrison of twenty thousand chosen troops. A scarcely less effectual protection seemed to be afforded it by the extreme severity of the winter which ensued. Nevertheless Prince Potemkin, eager to signalise himself at whatever cost of lives, paid no regard to the hundreds that daily perished from exposure to the cold, but still kept his forces in the field and began to bombard the city with red-hot balls. One of these fell on the great powder-magazine, which blew up with a terrible explosion, killing five thousand people and demolishing a portion of the wall. A general assault being given in consequence on the 17th of December, 1788, the place was taken by storm after a brave resistance and vast slaughter on both sides. The fall of this important border-fortress was felt as a great shock not only through the Turkish empire, but throughout all Europe. It was the first stronghold acquired by the Russians on the Euxine, and it filled a space in the popular apprehensions of those times not less than in our own day did Sebastopol.

In April of the next year, 1789, occurred the sudden demise of the Sultan Abdul Hamet, succeeded by his nephew Selim. The new Sovereign changed the Ministers and Generals, but maintained the warlike policy, of his predecessor. When, however, shortly afterwards the campaign commenced, it was marked by a long train of disasters to the Ottoman Empire. Joseph the Second, being detained by illness at Vienna, had summoned from retirement the veteran commander Laudohn, whose high military fame had up to that time excited his jealousy rather than his confidence. Advancing along the Save, Laudohn reduced Gradisca, and in spite of all opposition besieged and took the important city of Belgrade. In Moldavia Suwarrow had succeeded Romanzow as leader of the Russians, and displayed at once the uncultivated genius, the barbarian vigour for which his name has become renowned. Concerting measures with the Prince of Coburg, they marched beyond the Sereth, and utterly defeated the Turks in two bloody battles at Fockshan and at Rimnik. The Turks were driven in confusion across the Danube, while not only the city of Bucharest but the whole province of Wallachia became the spoil of the victors.

Along the wide extent of northern frontier there was yet space for another signal reverse to the Turkish arms. One of the changes made by the new Sultan had been to transfer the High Admiral, Hassan Pacha, from his own element to the land-service, giving him the command of some forces, with which he was directed to march into Bessarabia, there to aim at the recovery of Ockzakow and the protection of Bender. Hassan had passed the Danube and reached the village of Tobak, when he was encountered by a Russian army led by Prince Potemkin, and after a hard-fought action was utterly defeated.

Thus on all points had the Turks been put to the rout with heavy loss. Another such campaign might have driven them beyond the Bosphorus. But as in a former year from Sweden, so in the next there came to them an important diversion from the Netherlands and Hungary. In both the Emperor Joseph had attempted to establish reforms, good for the most part in themselves, but ill-timed, precipitate, and urged with arbitrary violence. In both there was a reaction not less violent, extending in Hungary to the very verge of civil war, and in the Netherlands to successful insurrection. Joseph, already on his death-bed, found it necessary to revoke all the most cherished measures of his not long but laborious life; and on the 20th of February, 1790, he expired.

Joseph was succeeded in the Hereditary States, as afterwards in the Imperial Crown, by his brother Leopold, the Grand Duke of Tuscany. Leopold at once applied himself, and not without success, to heal the wounds which Joseph had inflicted. Both Hungary and Belgium were by degrees restored to quiet, though still for a long time heaving with their recent agitation. Meanwhile on the Danube the Austrian troops had done little more than reduce Orsova and besiege Widdin. Leopold did not seek new victories, but expected to derive some fruits from those already gained. He thought it only reasonable that the Turks should be prepared to make considerable cessions in any treaty of peace.

It was at this point that the three Allies—the Cabinets of London, the Hague, and Berlin—were able to interpose with signal effect. Already, a few days only before the demise of Joseph, Prussia had concluded a treaty of alliance with the Porte, and commenced active preparations for war. It was now made clear to Leopold that unless he would renounce the concert of measures with Russia, and the schemes for the partition of Turkey, he must be prepared to encounter on the other side the whole force of the Prussian monarchy. England and Holland, though closely linked with Prussia in these negotiations, were admitted to take part as mediators in the Congress which was held at Reichenbach, in Silesia, between the rival States. Through their joint exertions Leopold was induced, seeking moreover to secure the votes of Brandenburg and Hanover at the approaching Imperial election, to conclude, in July, 1790, the Convention called of Reichenbach, renouncing his alliance with Russia, providing for a speedy peace between himself and the Porte, and consenting to give back all the conquests made on his part during the war.

The relief which this Convention afforded at a most seasonable time to the tottering Turkish empire was lessened in some degree by another treaty of peace concluded at nearly the same time between Russia and Sweden. The campaign on the side of Finland had been marked by numerous encounters both by land and sea, and with varying fortune, but even their successes brought heavy loss in men and in ships to the Swedes. Under these circumstances Gustavus rushed into peace with as much precipitation as he had into war. Without the smallest regard to his allies, or to his pledges, he signed a treaty at his camp in August, 1790, fixing his frontiers with Russia exactly as they stood before the war, and leaving the Empress Catherine at liberty to turn her entire and undivided forces against the Turks.

Of this liberty the Empress was resolved to make full use. Her armies had remained almost stationary on the Danube through the spring and summer, while Austria was in suspense and negotiations were in progress. But it was hoped that, as at Ockzakow, the winter season would not preclude an important blow. The object now in view was the reduction of Ismail, a strong town on the left arm of the Danube, near its mouth, and into which the Turks had thrown almost an army for a garrison. Prince Potemkin sent his instructions to General Suwarrow in these few words: 'You will take Ismail at whatever cost.' Having made his dispositions accordingly, Suwarrow on the morning of the 22nd of December, 1790, led up his troops to the assault. The resistance was obstinate, but unavailing, the slaughter terrible, and continued long after the resistance had ceased. It is computed that on the day of the storm, and on the two following, the number of the Turks that perished, men, women, and children together, amounted to no less than four and thirty thousand.

Policy of England—'The Russian Armament'—Concession of Pitt to the popular feeling—Death of Prince Potemkin—Lord Grenville appointed Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—Lord Chatham and Mr. Pitt compared by Lady Chatham—Marriage of the Duke of York—Correspondence with the Bishop of Lichfield—Pitt's patronage of humble merit in the Church—Commutation of Tithes—French Revolution—Declaration of Pilnitz—Riots at Birmingham—Destruction of Dr. Priestley's house.

In my last chapter I gave a slight, but perhaps for my purpose sufficient sketch of the events in Eastern and Northern Europe since 1787. That sketch has now brought me to the commencement of 1791, and will serve to explain the policy in that year of Mr. Pitt. He could look back with gratification to the success of the three Allies. He was proud to think that they had been able first to arrest the progress of Denmark in the North; next to curb the ambition of Austria, and compel her to renounce the conquests she had already made. It was his opinion that precisely the same course should be pursued towards Russia. But the negotiations with that view, conducted through the autumn and winter, proved altogether unsatisfactory. The Empress resented as an insult any interference of the Neutral Powers. She would hear nothing of moderation and forbearance. She was fully determined, even before the taking of Ismail, and still more fully after it, that in any treaty of peace with the Porte, she would retain a considerable portion of her conquests, and, above all, the fortress of Ockzakow as her first opening to the Euxine.

All remonstrances against this determination being haughtily rejected by the Court of Petersburg, Pitt thought that the time had come for more decisive measures. Already with that view had he kept in commission several ships beyond the regular peace establishment. He now sent orders to increase the number, and make them with all despatch ready for sea; and this, in the language of the time was called 'the Russian armament.' As at Reichenbach it was the muster along the frontier of a Prussian army ready for action that mainly weighed with Austria in conceding, so now, in all probability, might with Russia the aspect of a British fleet. But if not—if the Empress Catherine were bent on trying her strength against the countrymen of Hawke and Boscawen—then, as Pitt believed, the present balance of power, and the future security of Europe, were considerations of fully sufficient importance to justify a war.

On the 27th of March Pitt held a Cabinet upon this subject. He did not carry through his views without some difficulty, as will appear from a letter addressed to him in the course of the same night by the Duke of Richmond.

Whitehall, Sunday night, March 27, 1791.

My dear Sir,—Although it is next to impossible for two persons in the course of a variety of events always to see the same things in the same point of view, yet I cannot but feel hurt when I happen to differ from you in any essential point. At the same time I am sure that in one of such importance as that we discussed this morning in Cabinet, you would not wish me to keep back my real sentiments; and the more I think of the subject the more I am confirmed in my opinion that unless we have Holland, in some ostensible shape at least, with us, and the Swedish ports open to our fleet, with an accession of Poland to our alliance, we risk too much in pledging this country to Prussia to make war against Russia in order to compel her to make peace with the Porte upon the status quo. I have duly weighed all the arguments you made use of, which undoubtedly have great force, but I cannot say they have convinced me.

I have not the presumption to wish that my ideas should preponderate against yours and the majority of the Cabinet, and I by no means wish to enter any formal dissent to the measure, but merely to be understood by you that my opinion does not go with it. When once it is adopted, I shall contribute the little I can to its success. I am ever most truly and sincerely yours, RICHMOND.

Next day, however, Monday the 28th of March, Pitt presented to the House of Commons a message in the name of the King, stating that the endeavours which His Majesty had used, in concert with his Allies, to effect a reconciliation between Russia and the Porte having hitherto been unsuccessful, he judged it requisite to make some further augmentation of his naval force, and he trusted that his faithful Commons would be ready to make good the expenses that might be incurred. No sooner was the Message delivered than Fox started up to declare his opposition to its purport. On the following day, and on several subsequent occasions, he argued against it with his usual force, ably seconded by several of his friends: in the Commons by Grey, Sheridan, and Whitbread; in the Peers by Lords Loughborough and Stormont, and Lord North, now Earl of Guilford. Was it really of such vast importance to English interests whether Russia did or did not retain the territory between the Boug and Dniester, or even the strong-hold of Ockzakow? Was it really worth while to incur all the costs and all the calamities of war for a desolate tract of marshes, and for a fortress half in ruins?

The great eloquence which Fox displayed upon this subject was not greater than of late years he had displayed upon many other subjects. But he had the pleasure to find that it made far more impression on his hearers. The evils of Russian ambition were contingent and remote; those of increased expenditure plain, palpable, immediate. But, moreover, Fox having no official considerations to restrain him, could discuss the question boldly in all its bearings. Pitt, on the other hand, deemed it inconsistent with his duty to reveal the exact state of the negotiation, or even to mention Ockzakow, and thus he could only, as it were, meet a rapier with a foil.

The Russian armament, therefore, found no favour with the public. On the day after the King's Message, and when the Opposition had moved an amendment to the Address, the Ministers prevailed by a majority of 93; but on the next occasion, and in a much fuller House, that majority declined to 80. Out of doors the measure grew daily more unpopular. Even in the ranks of the majority there were many doubtful or reluctant votes. Pitt felt that he must sound a retreat.

Once convinced of the necessity of yielding, Pitt did not procrastinate or linger. It was, he saw, of pressing importance that the country should not become more deeply committed on this question. He despatched to Russia with all possible speed a Messenger, who fortunately arrived in sufficient time to withhold our Minister from presenting to the Court of Petersburg a new and threatening Note which was already prepared. And in relinquishing the warlike measures which he had commenced for the recovery of Ockzakow, Pitt was anxious by means of a secret letter, addressed to Mr. Ewart, to explain to the Court of Berlin the urgent reasons for that change. That letter, as derived from the draft in Pitt's own writing, has been already printed in the Life by Bishop Tomline, but I shall here print it again. It is necessary to premise that Mr. Ewart had lately

Holwood, May 24, 1791.

My dear Sir,—You are so fully apprised, from your own observation, and from our repeated conversations, of all which has passed here in relation to affairs abroad, and of every sentiment of mine on the subject, that I can have nothing fresh to add in this letter.

I wish, however, to repeat my earnest and anxious desire that you should find means of informing the King of Prussia, as openly and explicitly as possible, of the real state of the business, and of the true motives of our conduct. He knows, I am persuaded, too well the effect which opinion and public impression must always have in this country, either to complain of our change of measures or to wonder at it, if the true cause be fully explained to him. You perfectly know that no man could be more eagerly bent than I was on a steady adherence to the line which we had at first proposed, of going all lengths to enforce the terms of the strict status quo; and I am still as much persuaded as ever that if we could have carried the support of the country with us, the risk and expense of the struggle, even if Russia had not submitted without a struggle, would not have been more than the object was worth.

But notwithstanding this was my own fixed opinion, I saw with certainty, in a very few days after the subject was first discussed in Parliament, that the prospect of obtaining a support sufficient to carry this line through with vigour and effect was absolutely desperate. We did indeed carry our question in the House of Commons, by not an inconsiderable majority; and we shall, I am persuaded, continue successful in resisting all the attempts of Opposition as long as the negotiation is depending. But from what I know of the sentiments of the greatest part of that majority, and of many of the warmest friends of Government, I am sure that if, in persisting in the line of the status quo, we were to come to the point of actually calling for supplies to support the war, and were to state, as would then be indispensable, the precise ground on which it arose, that we should either not carry such a question, or carry it only by so weak a division as would nearly amount to a defeat. This opinion I certainly formed neither hastily nor willingly; nor could I easily make a sacrifice more painful to myself than I have done in yielding to it. But feeling the circumstances to be such as I have stated them, the only question that remained was, whether we should persist, at all hazards, in pushing our first determination, though without a chance of rendering it effectual to its object, or whether we should endeavour to do what appears to be the next best, when what we wished to do became impracticable.

To speak plainly: the obvious effect of our persisting would have been to risk the existence of the present Government, and with it the whole of our system both at home and abroad. The personal part of this consideration it would have been our duty to overlook, and I trust we should all have been ready to do so, if by any risk of our own we should have contributed to the attainment of a great and important object for this country and its allies; but the consequence must evidently have been the reverse. The overthrow of our system here, at the same time that it hazarded driving the Government at home into a state of absolute confusion, must have shaken the whole of our system abroad. It is not difficult to foresee what must have been the consequence to Prussia of a change effected by an opposition to the very measures taken in concert with that Court, and resting on the avowed ground of our present system of alliance.

On these considerations it is that we have felt the necessity of changing our plan, and endeavouring to find the best expedient we can for terminating the business without extremities. Fortunately, the having succeeded in stopping the proposed representation to Russia has prevented our being as pointedly committed as there was reason to apprehend we might have been. The modifications which have been suggested, the recommendation of them from Spain, the prospect of bringing that Court to join in a subsequent guarantee of the Turkish possessions, and the chance of, perhaps, bringing the Emperor to accede to our system, are all circumstances which give an opening for extricating us from our present difficulty. You are so fully master of the whole of those details, that I shall not enlarge upon them. My great object is, that you should be able to satisfy the King of Prussia of the strong necessity under which we have acted, and that we really had no other choice, with a view either to his interests or to those which we are most bound to consult at home.

I am, &c., W. PITT.

The concession here made by Pitt in good time (for on that in a concession everything depends) to the popular feeling averted his Parliamentary danger. But the whole transaction tended to dim his Parliamentary renown. Here was manifestly a miscalculation and a failure,—the first on any foreign question that he had ever known. Men began to whisper that his fall might be near at hand—that the public confidence was lost—that the King's favour was declining—that His Majesty had been heard to say at his Levee that, should any change become requisite, he had no personal objections to Mr. Fox. It may likewise be observed that rumours of this kind were not without their effect on the dissension which broke forth directly afterwards between Fox and Burke. Even such politicians of the Opposition side as at heart agreed with Burke on the terrors of the French Revolution, deemed it impolitic to side with the philosopher just retiring from the stage, and to break with the statesman perhaps on the very point of being called to the head of affairs.

On another point also was Burke mixed up in this transaction. He had taken part with Fox in speaking and voting against the Russian armament; but subsequently to their quarrel he stated a charge against his former friend in a private letter to the Duke of Portland, which, some years later, was surreptitiously and without his leave made public. The charge was, that Mr. Fox, without in any manner consulting his party, had sent Mr. Adair (at a later period Sir Robert) on a secret mission to Petersburg with the view to counteract the efforts of the King's Envoy, Mr. Fawkener. Such had been the rumour at the time. Mr. Pitt himself, though he did not accuse Mr. Fox of any share in this transaction, twice in the House of Commons intimated an idea that the presence of Mr. Adair at the Russian Court had been injurious. 'Better terms,' he said, 'might have been obtained at Petersburg, had it not been for certain circumstances of notoriety hostile to the political interests of England.' In the heat of party conflict it must be owned that there appeared some grounds of probability sufficient to justify the charge.

Many years afterwards, however, that is in 1821, the charge was revived by Bishop Tomline in a more deliberate form. The Bishop said that its accuracy was attested by authentic documents among Mr. Pitt's papers. But, when publicly appealed to by Sir Robert Adair, he did not produce any. I certainly have not found any such among the papers which were then in the Bishop's hands and which are now in mine, and I believe that the Bishop's memory must have entirely deceived him on this point. The final vindication of Sir Robert—dated in February, 1842, and published in the Fox Memorials—appears to me complete. It clearly shows that the journey to Petersburg was Mr. Adair's own act, without any suggestion of Mr. Fox and without any treacherous design of either. Mr. Fox went no farther than to say, as he most reasonably might, when Mr. Adair took leave of him, 'Well, if you are determined to go, send us all the news.'

The Czarina, however, received Mr. Adair with high honours as the friend of Fox, and took pains to contrast her demeanour to him with that to Mr. Fawkener. She professed the highest regard for the great orator in consequence of his recent course; and having obtained his bust from England, placed it in a gallery of her palace between those of Demosthenes and Cicero.

Abroad, it became necessary for the Prussian Ministers to follow the course of England. They could not persevere with effect in resisting the pretensions of Russia on the side of Turkey; and the Porte itself had no alternative but to yield. It was agreed that the Czarina should retain the fortress of Ockzakow, and the territory between the Boug and the Dniester; the latter stream to be henceforth the limit between the two empires. The Preliminaries of Peace were signed on the 11th of August, and a Congress was appointed to be held at Yassy for the completion of the treaty.

In October, and before this peace was finally adjusted, died Prince Potemkin, one of the most zealous promoters of the war. His ascendency with the Empress had recently declined under the influence of a younger rival. He was travelling to Nicolayeff for change of air, in company with his niece the Countess Braniska, when he felt himself so ill that he desired to be lifted from the carriage and placed on the grass beneath a tree, and there—like the humblest wayfarer on the road-side—did this favourite of fortune expire. Chagrin and anxiety had combined to ruin his health with excesses of the table. 'His usual breakfast at this time was a smoked goose, with a large quantity of wine and spirits, and he dined in the same manner.' So, at least, says the biographer of Paul Jones.[1] Paul Jones himself at this time was no longer in the Russian service. So early as April, 1789, he had found it necessary to leave Petersburg in disgrace under a heavy personal charge; and he died at Paris in great obscurity in July, 1792.

There had been rumours in England of Ministerial changes consequent upon the Russian armament. But the only real resignation that ensued was that of the Duke of Leeds. His Grace, in a highly honourable spirit, resolved, rather than consent to modify the policy recommended in his own office, to throw up the Seals. The place thus left vacant was supplied by transferring Lord Grenville from the Home to the Foreign Department; while Dundas, although still retaining the Presidency of the India Board, was appointed Home Secretary. His appointment, however, was regarded as only temporary. It was the wish of Pitt, to which he obtained the King's assent, that Lord Cornwallis should return from India and become Home Secretary. The offer went out to [1] Memoirs of Paul Jones, vol. ii. p. 137, ed. 1830.

Calcutta, but Lord Cornwallis explained in the first place that it was impossible for him to quit his post while the war with Tippoo continued. Subsequently it further appeared that Lord Cornwallis, conscious of his deficiencies as a debater, was unwilling to accept any Parliamentary office that should require speeches on his part. And thus the appointment of Dundas, though provisional at first, was finally looked upon as permanent.

Lord Grenville, as raised to the Upper House and as placed at the Foreign Office, had now an adequate and well-adapted field for his eminent abilities. The Peers found in him a leader of whom they might be proud. They acknowledged his constant application to all the details of public business. They listened with unvarying respect to his grave and well-poised, his sententious and sonorous eloquence. At the Foreign Office he showed at all times a lofty English spirit and a watchful jealousy of the national honour; and the despatches which he carefully prepared were excellent State papers. As a politician, however, he had one deficiency, which, in a private letter of a later period, he candidly avowed: 'I am not competent to the management of men. I never was so naturally, and toil and anxiety more and more unfit me for it.'[1]

At this time and for many years subsequently Lord Grenville was on most cordial and intimate terms with Pitt. They treated each other not only as Cabinet colleagues, but as the near kinsmen that they were. That bond of kinsmanship was drawn still closer when in July, 1792, Lord Grenville married the Hon. Anne Pitt, only daughter of Lord Camelford. At the moment I am writing (sixty-eight years later) that lady still in most honoured old age survives.

In the course of this spring there was also some change in the lesser offices. Of the two Secretaries of the Treasury since 1784, Mr. Steele and Mr. Rose, the former became Joint Paymaster, with the rank of Privy Councillor, and with the Hon. Dudley Ryder, the eldest son of Lord Harrowby, for a colleague. He was succeeded in his first post by Mr. Charles Long, an attached friend of Mr. Pitt, and an excellent man of business, who was raised to the peerage in 1826 as Lord Farnborough, and who in his later years was distinguished by his knowledge of Art. Mr. Rose on the other hand remained Secretary of the Treasury through the whole first administration of Mr. Pitt.

At the close of June, and while Pitt was still detained in London, we find Wilberforce pay a visit at Burton Pynsent, and describe that visit in his Diary. 'June 30. Got to Pynsent at night. Old Lady Chatham a noble antiquity, very like Lady Harriot, and the Pitt voice.—July 1. At Burton all day. Walked and talked with Eliot. Lady Chatham asked about Fox's speaking—is much interested in politics. Seventy-five years old, and a very active mind.'

Lady Chatham, though at that time in retirement and old age, was indeed, as Lord Macaulay says, 'a woman of considerable abilities.' She had been the main stay of her husband in sickness and sorrow. She had assisted in unfolding the early promise of her son. I once asked Sir Robert Peel whether he could remember any other instance in modern history where a woman had almost equal reason to be proud in two relations of life—of her son and of her husband. When next I saw Sir Robert, he told me that he had thought over the question with care, and could produce no other instance quite in point since the days of Philip of Macedon. The nearest approach to it, he said, would be that of Mr. Pitt's own rival; since Mr. Fox would well sustain one half of the parallel, but the first Lord Holland, although a man of great abilities, was wholly unequal to the first Lord Chatham.

Perhaps I may presume to add an anecdote which I derived at nearly the same time from Lady Chatham's last surviving grand-daughter, my aunt, Lady Griselda Tekell.

Grosvenor Place, Feb. 1, 1850.

I have a favour to ask of you. My father once mentioned to me a little anecdote of much interest which he had heard from you at a former time, to the effect of Lady Chatham being asked whether she thought her husband or her son the greater statesman, and of her having answered—certainly with excellent taste and judgment as a wife, however the comparison might be held by others—that there could be no doubt at all as to Lord Chatham being far the superior. Might I request of you to put down on paper exactly what you remember of this story, and to let me have it? I think that a trait so curious and so creditable to the person concerned ought to be preserved in the most authentic shape.

Lady Griselda answered me as follows:—

With respect to the question you put to me concerning what my grandmother, Lady Chatham, said of the ability of her husband, I did not consider it as relating to his character as a statesman, but to his general talents. When I was about fifteen I was on a visit to Burton Pynsent, and one day asked her in rather a childish manner, 'Which do you think the cleverest, Grandpapa or Mr. Pitt?' To which her answer was, 'Your Grandpapa, without doubt,' or some equivalent expression. Her own understanding was so superior, her judgment on this point carries great weight.

In July, 1791, we find Pitt—as usual at the close of the Session—turn his thoughts to Somersetshire. And, as it chanced, the King's residence at Weymouth during many weeks of this autumn enabled the Minister to pay not one visit only, but two, at Burton.

Wimbledon, July 2, 1791.

My dear Mother,—I heartily wish I could gratify Mr. Reid in an object so interesting to him; but I have not yet been able to ascertain clearly in whose recommendation the living in question is. I much fear it will prove to be in the Chancellor's. If it should be in mine, I trust there can be nothing to prevent my giving it as he wishes. I was not a little disappointed at being prevented from coming to you at the time I expected, and the disappointment is not the less from circumstances hitherto having followed one another so as to leave me very uncertain when I may be at liberty. It is not impossible that I may find ten days or a fortnight before the end of this month, but as yet I hardly dare reckon upon it. We are all anxious spectators of the strange scene in France, and still in entire suspense as to the issue of it, with respect to the personal situation of the King and Queen, and the form of their future government. No material news has arrived from thence within these few days, and it is very difficult, in such a state, to have any accounts on which we can rely for accuracy as to particulars.

The result of our own negotiations on the Continent is also still uncertain. This situation makes the idleness of our holidays not quite complete, but it allows time for excursions during half the week either to this place or Holwood, and the weather for some days has made every hour in the country delightful. Have the goodness to tell Eliot that I received his letter, and will write to him in a day or two. Affectionate compliments to Mrs. Stapleton, and love to little girl.

Ever, my dear Mother, &c., W. PITT.

Downing Street, July 21, 1791.

I am still in the same state of suspense with regard to the events which are to decide when I may reckon on a sufficient interval of holidays to reach Burton. It cannot, however, be much longer before I shall be able to judge. In the mean time I am enough at liberty to meditate an excursion for a couple of days at the end of this week into Hampshire, from whence I hope by stealth to get a view of the fleet, which is an object well worth seeing, and which I hope after this summer there will not be an opportunity of seeing again for some time.

Downing Street, Sept. 24, 1791.

My dear Mother,—You will wonder to receive a letter from me dated from hence, and I write merely that the newspapers may not give you the first information of my arrival, with whatever may be their ingenious speculations on the occasion of it. The real cause is a difficulty of form respecting the Duke of York's marriage, which has been precipitately fixed at Berlin for next week, without waiting for the regular signification of the Council as required by the famous Marriage Act. We found it the shortest way to come to town, in order to expedite the necessary forms as much as possible; but it is still doubtful whether anything we can do will be in time to make the marriage valid, and whether the ceremony must not be performed again. I shall stay no longer than is necessary for this business, and shall probably be at Weymouth again on Tuesday or Wednesday, a very few days after which will bring me to Burton.

Ever, my dear Mother, &c., W. Pitt.

Downing Street, Oct. 4, 1791.

I am very sorry the newspapers have done so much honour to my gout. I had in fact just enough for a few days to furnish materials for a paragraph, but it was very little inconvenience while it lasted, and has left none behind it.

The marriage of the Duke of York, to which Pitt in these letters refers, was solemnised at Berlin on the 29th of September. His bride was the Princess Frederica, eldest daughter of the King of Prussia. 'She is far from handsome,' writes Lord Malmesbury, 'but lively, sensible, and very tractable; and if only one tenth part of the attachment they now show for each other remains, it will be very sufficient to make a most happy marriage.'[1] But from the events of subsequent years it may be feared that even that tenth part did not remain.

Passing to another subject, I may observe that the papers of Mr. Pitt tend in many respects to prove the unsatisfactory condition, at that time, of the Church of

[1] To the Duke of Portland, Coblentz, Oct. 14, 1791.

England. There was then, as some of its best friends have owned, but too much scope for the great and general improvement which has since ensued. There was then, at least in some cases, a low tone of feeling, such as in the present day we should deem scarcely possible. Here, for example, are some letters that passed between the Minister and the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, the brother of Earl Cornwallis.

Wimpole Street, June 10, 1791.

Sir,—After the various instances of neglect and contempt which Lord Cornwallis and I have experienced, not only in violation of repeated assurances, but of the strongest ties, it is impossible that I should not feel the late disappointment very deeply.

With respect to the proposal concerning Salisbury, I have no hesitation in saying that the See of Salisbury cannot be in any respect an object to me. The only arrangement which promises an accommodation in my favour is the promotion of the Bishop of Lincoln to Salisbury, which would enable you to confer the Deanery of St. Paul's upon me. I have the honour to be, &c., J. LICHFIELD AND COVENTRY.

Downing Street, Saturday night,
June 11, 1791.

My Lord,—On my return to town this afternoon I found your Lordship's letter. I am willing to hope that on further consideration, and on recollecting all the circumstances, there are parts of that letter which you would yourself wish never to have written.

My respect for your Lordship's situation, and my regard for Lord Cornwallis, prevent my saying more than that until that letter is recalled, your Lordship makes any further intercourse between you and me impossible.

I have the honour to be, &c., W. PITT.

Wimpole Street, June 11, 1791.

Sir,—Under the very great disappointment which I have felt upon the late occasion, I am much concerned that I was induced to make use of expressions in my letter to you of which I have since repented, and which upon consideration I beg leave to retract, and I hope that they will make no unfavourable impression upon your mind.

Whatever may be your thoughts respecting the subject matter of the letter, I trust that you will have the candour to pardon those parts of it which may appear to be wanting in due and proper respect to you, and believe me to have the honour, &c., J. LICHFIELD AND COVENTRY.

Downing Street, June 12, 1791.

My Lord,—I have this morning received the honour of your Lordship's letter, dated the 11th, and have great satisfaction in being enabled to dismiss from my mind any impression occasioned by a paragraph in the former letter which I received from you.

With respect to any further arrangement, I can only say that I have no reason to believe that the Bishop of Lincoln would wish to remove to Salisbury; but if he were, I should certainly have no hesitation in recommending your Lordship for the Deanery of St. Paul's.

I have the honour to be, &c., W. PITT.[1]

It has sometimes been alleged that Mr. Pitt was not judicious in his Ecclesiastical appointments or preferments. Perhaps indeed neither Mr. Pitt nor yet any other Minister in the reign of George the Third showed sufficient care to seek out or to call forth rising talents in the Church. But on the other hand there were many instances in which Pitt rejected the most powerful recommendations rather than fail to reward an humble course of parish duties. Here is one letter in proof which I select from a later year. It is addressed to the Earl of Carnarvon.

Downing Street, Jan. 21, 1797.

My Lord,—I ought to make very many apologies for having in the succession of business left your Lordship so long in suspense on the subject of the applications which I had the honour of receiving from you relative to the Living of Newbury. Allow me to assure you that it would afford me very sincere satisfaction if I felt myself at liberty to show my attention to your wishes, and especially on an occasion when they are so naturally entitled to it. But I trust you will allow for the circumstances which preclude me from doing so, when I say that Mr. Roe, a gentleman who has for some time officiated there, has on that ground been recommended to me with such peculiar testimonies of his exemplary conduct and of the good effects produced by it in the town, that I should not feel justified in proposing any other person to His Majesty in preference to him. I certainly should not on any less urgent ground have hesitated to support your Lordship's recommendation.

[1] In August this same year the Bishop of Lichfield was named Dean of Windsor, and in February, 1794, translated to the richer Deanery of Durham.

I have the honour to be, &c., W. PITT.

Downing Street, Dec. 16, 1791.

My Lord,—I took the liberty of mentioning to your Grace not long since that some suggestions had been brought under my view respecting a general commutation of Tithes for a Corn Rent conformably to a plan which was adopted in the instance of two or three parishes by separate Enclosure Bills in the course of the last Session. A paper has been drawn up at my desire, stating shortly the principal considerations which seem to arise out of this proposal, and according to your Grace's permission I have the honour of enclosing it.

I am very far from venturing to form a decided opinion respecting the possibility or expediency of any new arrangement, or the merits of this particular plan. But the whole subject seems to me, especially at the present moment, to be of the most serious importance, and there are appearances which but too strongly indicate that it is likely to be agitated in different parts of the country.

It seems, therefore, very desirable that any proposal which aims at obviating the present complaints, and at the same time securing the interests of the Church, should engage the early attention of those who wish well to the Establishment, in order that they may be enabled to give a proper direction to the business, if it can be put into any practicable shape, or after full examination to resist on the best grounds anything of a mischievous tendency. With this view I felt anxious to submit this idea to your Grace's consideration.

If there are any persons with whom your Grace may think proper to consult confidentially on any part of the business, I would beg that the communication with which I have troubled you may be understood to be entirely a private one.

Possibly as the Archbishop of York is now at Bath, your Grace may have an opportunity of conversing with him and of showing him the papers, which I should be very desirous of his seeing. I have the honour, &c., W. PITT.

I do not find the Archbishop's reply among Mr. Pitt's papers. Since, however, the measure in question was no further pursued, it is plain that the answer must have been discouraging. All friends of the Church will, I think, join me in lamenting the error of judgment that was here committed. Why should the general Commutation of Tithes—a measure accomplished with such general assent and such excellent result some forty years later—have been without necessity, and through many scenes of strife, laid aside when a public-spirited Minister proposed it?

Most anxiously through the whole of 1791 did the eyes of Europe continue fixed on France. At the beginning of the year it was hoped that some main leaders of the Revolution, alarmed at its excesses, might be found both willing and able to restrain them. It was on Mirabeau, above all, that such hopes depended. But his untimely death, which occurred on the 2nd of April, left the vessel of the state with no competent pilot, and drifting to the shoals.

Not many months elapsed ere the King, provoked beyond endurance by almost daily insults and wrongs, determined to make an effort for his deliverance. Accompanied by the Queen and his two children, and bearing a passport under a feigned name, he secretly set out from Paris on the 21st of June, by no means designing, as his enemies have alleged, a restoration of the Ancien Régime, but rather the establishment, under better auspices, of a limited Constitutional Monarchy. Had he succeeded in reaching the frontier town Montmédy, the destinies not of France only but of Europe might probably have been changed. Unhappily at Varennes the features of Louis were recognised by the post-master, Drouet; the Royal party was arrested and led back to Paris in mob triumph. Henceforth the King had little choice. In the month of September he accepted the new Constitution which the Assembly had framed, and took an oath to its observance. Then, as had been previously determined, the Assembly dissolved itself, as considering its work completed, and making way for the new legislative body.

One effect of the troubles in France was a concert of measures between the Emperor Leopold and the King of Prussia. The animosity that once existed between them had now ceased, partly from the Convention of Reichenbach, which removed the causes of dispute, and partly from the retirement of Count Hertzberg, who of all the Prussian Ministers was the most averse to the Austrian cause. In the month of August the two Sovereigns met at Pilnitz, a country palace of the Elector of Saxony. Their main object was to confer on the affairs of Poland, but they had likewise begun to feel that the cause of Monarchy itself might be imperilled by the issue of events at Paris. On this last point the Royal deliberations were quickened by the arrival at Dresden of the Comte d'Artois and M. de Calonne in the name of the Emigrant party. The two Sovereigns agreed to publish the celebrated Declaration of Pilnitz. In that document it is stated that the situation of the King of France was a matter of common interest, and that to set right that situation, even by force of arms, they would invoke the concert and assistance of the other European powers.

Besides this open and avowed declaration, it was immediately alleged by the leading Frenchmen on the Revolutionary side, that there were other and secret articles providing for the partition of France. But there appears to have been no just ground for such a charge. 'As far as we have been able to trace,' said Mr. Pitt, on a long subsequent occasion, 'the Declaration of Pilnitz referred to the imprisonment of Louis the Sixteenth. Its immediate view was to effect his deliverance, if a concert sufficiently extensive could be formed for that purpose. It left the internal state of France to be decided by the King restored to his liberty, with the free consent of the States of the kingdom, and it did not contain one word relative to the dismemberment of France.'[1]

The Declaration of Pilnitz raised to a high pitch the spirits of the Emigrants. Their chief men, now reinforced by the arrival of Monsieur, the King's next brother, from France, held their councils at Coblentz, and set on foot negotiations with several other Potentates. Both the Empress of Russia and the King of Sweden showed a strong disposition to take up arms in their cause. But when it came to that positive issue, the prudence of Leopold, and his alarm for Flanders, were proof against their violent counsels. Frederick William, in like manner, wavered and drew back. Neither of these Sovereigns was in truth willing to act without England. And though the personal wishes of George the Third might be with them, the Cabinet of London had from the first expressed itself determined to observe a strict neutrality.

Thus, in its result, the famous Declaration of Pilnitz bore little or no fruit. And when a few weeks afterwards M. de Calonne, in the name of the Emigrant Princes at Coblentz, stated to the Court of London a plan which they had formed for the invasion of France, and for the effecting of a counter-Revolution, and when he most earnestly implored the loan of three or four hundred thousand pounds to assist them in that object, he met with a positive refusal on the part of Mr. Pitt.[2] friends of the French Revolution and its adversaries grew keener and keener. Unhappily they came to a violent issue at Birmingham, in the person of Dr. Priestley, who, since the recent death of Dr. Price, might be regarded as the leader of the Unitarians in England. Joseph Priestley was a man of considerable scientific as well as controversial fame. For a long period he had been the librarian and chosen friend of Lord Shelburne. The breach which ensued between them has been ascribed to the increasing licence of his published speculations. On leaving Bowood he had fixed his residence and built his meeting-house at Birmingham, where he was further known as an ardent admirer of the Revolutionary principles of France. He designed, in conjunction with several other persons in 1791, to celebrate the 14th of July, the anniversary of the taking of the Bastille, by a public dinner.

On the other hand, the people of Birmingham, far from concurring in his sentiments, either religious or political, were at that time stanch for Church and King. They viewed the proposed entertainment with great disfavour, and they were further incensed by the appearance, some days beforehand, of a seditious hand-bill inviting them to dine, and 'tyrants to beware.' It was not known from whom that hand-bill proceeded, but its reflections upon the King and the Parliament were of such a kind, that a reward of 100*l.* was offered for the detection of the author and printer.

Violence like this called forth a most unjustifiable reaction. When on the appointed day some eighty persons (Priestley himself, however, not among them) repaired to the chosen tavern to eat their dinner and make their speeches, they found the doors beset by an angry crowd, which received them with hissing and yelling. Towards evening a riot began. First the windows of the inn were broken. Then proceeding from outrage to outrage, the mob demolished Dr. Priestley's and another meeting-house, as also the dwellings of

Dr. Priestley and of several of his friends, both in the town and neighbourhood. Drunkenness, as is almost invariably the case in English riots, mingled largely with destruction ; and in other cases, the rioters levied sums of money as the price of their forbearance. The magistrates were for some time unable to suppress these tumults, and commencing as they did on the Thursday, they continued at intervals until the Sunday evening, when three troops of horse arrived.

Dr. Priestley, by these destructive outrages, lost not only his household furniture, his valuable library and his philosophical instruments, but also manuscripts which the toil of his remaining years might not suffice to restore. At the assizes, held in the ensuing month, great pains were taken to bring the offenders to justice. There were fifteen persons apprehended, four convicted, and three hanged. Next spring the other persons, eleven in number, whose property had suffered most, brought actions for damages against the neighbouring Hundreds ; and they recovered, on the whole, in Worcestershire 5,504*l.*, and in Warwickshire 21,456*l.* These sums, large as they appear, were below the amount that had been claimed; and loud complaints were heard against the 'ignorant Juries' which allowed compensation only for such objects as chairs and tables, but not for manuscripts or philosophical instruments whose value they could not understand.

Nor were other reproaches wanting against both the Magistrates and the Clergy of the Birmingham district. It was alleged that in their horror of Dissent, they had some secret sympathy with the riots, and had failed to show sufficient heartiness either in their suppression or their punishment. A charge of this kind is easily made. In the case before us, it appears to me not in the least established.

Dr. Priestley, though secure from further attacks or losses in London, found even there the national feeling so strong against him, that after no long interval he embarked for the United States. As in France the Revolutionary leaders ascribed every evil that befell them to the villanous machination of Pitt, so did their friends in England not scruple to declare that the Birmingham riots had been purposely stirred up by the same abominable statesman. Mr. Coleridge, then one of that party, begins a sonnet as follows:—

> Though, roused by that dark Vizier, Riot rude
> Have driven our Priestley o'er the ocean swell,
> Though Superstition and her wolfish brood
> Bay his mild radiance . . . . .

Parliament met again on the last day of January, 1792. It was opened by the King in person. His Majesty began by announcing the happy event of the marriage of the Duke of York. He promised the production of papers to explain the former negotiations with the Court of Petersburg. He expressed a confident hope of the maintenance of peace, and as the best pledge of that confidence, recommended an immediate reduction in our naval and military establishments and a proportionate relief of the people from the weight of taxation.

To submit these recommendations in a more definite shape, Pitt brought forward his Budget as the first business of the Session. The revenue, he said, had been constantly increasing under the influence of the national prosperity during the last few years. Its average for the last four was 16,200,000*l.*, or 400,000*l.* in excess of the annual expenditure for the same period. Of this surplus he proposed to add 200,000*l.* yearly to the Sinking Fund, and to take off taxes to the amount of the other moiety. The taxes which he proposed to repeal were the additional tax upon malt laid on last year, and the imposts upon female servants, carts and waggons, houses having less than seven windows, and the last half-penny per pound upon candles. He held out a most encouraging prospect of still further relief from the repeal of taxes within the next fifteen years; 'for although,' said he, 'we must not count with certainty on the continuance of our present prosperity during such an interval, yet unquestionably there never was a time in the history of this country when from the situation of Europe we might more reasonably expect fifteen years of peace than we may at the present moment.'[1]

Proceeding on this conviction, Pitt asked the House to vote only 16,000 seamen, being 2,000 less than last year. As to the land forces, he proposed not to renew but on the contrary allow to expire the subsidiary treaty with Hesse. By this and by some other savings which he explained, he trusted to reduce the cost of the military establishments by 200,000*l.* a-year.

From these reductions and from the prophecy of peace which he had hazarded, it is plain how firmly the Prime Minister was set against any interference with France. So high was then the public credit that at the beginning of the year Pitt intended to propose a reduction of the Four per Cents. to Three-and-a-Half per Cents. The draft of a Bill for that purpose was found among his papers. But on further consideration he resolved to defer the measure until the next Session, when he hoped to be able to reduce these funds to Three per Cents. Little did he think what that next Session would bring forth, and that not only many years but tens of years would pass ere any opportunity for reduction would re-occur.

In his speech on the Budget this year—one of the greatest and most comprehensive financial statements that he ever made—it is striking to find the Prime Minister ascribe the merit of his system in no small degree to the author of the 'Wealth of Nations'—'an author,' said Pitt, 'now unhappily no more; whose extensive knowledge of detail and depth of philosophical research will, I believe, furnish the best solution to every question connected with the history of commerce or with the systems of political economy.'

The financial policy of Pitt had been crowned with so much success in the past, and seemed so full of promise for the future, as to leave little room for objection to Fox and Fox's friends. They hoped to succeed better on the production of the Ockzakow papers. Upon these a direct motion of censure of the Government was founded by Mr. Whitbread. The debate was continued with great vehemence and singular ability for two nights. But it soon appeared that the same gentlemen who had been willing to vote with the Opposition in the preceding year on purpose to avoid a war, were by no means inclined to repeat that vote where the object was only to displace a Minister. Thus in the division Fox found no increase to his already diminished and still diminishing forces.

The debate which thus concluded is chiefly memorable—and will be so to the latest ages—from Fox's own share in it. His speech upon the Russian armament on the 1st of March, 1792, has been ranked by the best judges with that on the Westminster Scrutiny in 1785 and that on the French armament in 1803, as the three highest efforts that his admirable powers of oratory ever achieved.

In that discussion there also took part—and it was the first time that he spoke in Parliament—a very young man, Mr. Robert Banks Jenkinson, the eldest son of Lord Hawkesbury; in after years Prime Minister and Earl of Liverpool. In closing the debate that evening, Mr. Pitt took occasion to pay a high and just compliment to that speech, 'as a specimen of clear eloquence, strong sense, justness of reasoning, and extensive knowledge.'

On one question of great importance the oratory of both Pitt and Fox even though combined could not prevail. This was the immediate abolition of the Slave Trade, for which on the 2nd of April Mr. Wilberforce moved. There was no longer any direct opposition. That, if not conscience, decency forbade. Both Mr. Jenkinson and Mr. Dundas acknowledged the Slave Trade to be indefensible. Yet each in different ways sought to elude the proposal before them. Mr. Jenkinson said that he desired to render the Slave Trade unnecessary by a progressive improvement in the treatment of the slaves, and by their consequently more prolific marriages. He had framed some Resolutions with that view, for which 87 Members voted. But far greater favour attended the more moderate motion of Mr. Dundas that the word 'gradually' should be inserted. Both the Prime Minister and the chief of his opponents stood up warmly for the original words; and the speech of Pitt on this occasion is regarded as one of the very greatest that he ever made. Only a few hours afterwards Wilberforce wrote as follows to a friend: 'I take up my pen to inform you that after a very long debate (we did not separate till near seven this morning), my motion for immediate abolition was put by, though supported strenuously by Mr. Fox, and by Mr. Pitt with more energy and ability than were almost ever exerted in the House of Commons. Windham, who has no love for Pitt, tells me that Fox and Grey, with whom he walked home after the debate, agreed with him in thinking Pitt's speech one of the most extraordinary displays of eloquence they had ever heard; for the last twenty minutes he really seemed to be inspired. . . . . He was dilating upon the future prospects of civilizing Africa, a topic which I had suggested to him in the morning.'

Here are some extracts, though abridged, of this justly celebrated peroration:—'There was a time, Sir, when the very practice of the Slave Trade prevailed among us. Slaves, as we may read in Henry's "History of Great Britain," were formerly an established article in our exports. "Great numbers," he says, "were exported like cattle from the British coast, and were to be seen exposed for sale in the Roman market." But it is the slavery in Africa which is now called on to furnish the alleged proofs that Africa labours under a natural incapacity for civilization; that Providence never intended her to rise above a state of barbarism; that Providence has irrecoverably doomed her to be only a nursery for slaves for us free and civilized Europeans. Allow of this principle as applied to Africa, and I should be glad to know why it might not also have been applied to ancient and uncivilized Britain? Why might not some Roman Senator, reasoning on the principles of some Hon. gentlemen, and pointing to British barbarians, have predicted with equal boldness, "There is a people that will never rise to civilization; there is a people destined never to be free"? We, Sir, have long since emerged from barbarism; we have almost forgotten that we were once barbarians. There is, indeed, one thing wanting to complete the contrast and to clear us altogether from the imputation of acting even to this hour as barbarians; for we continue even to this hour a barbarous traffic in slaves.

'Sir, I trust we shall no longer continue this commerce, to the destruction of every improvement on that wide continent; and shall not consider ourselves as conferring too great a boon in restoring its inhabitants to the rank of human beings. I trust we shall not think ourselves too liberal, if, by abolishing the slave-trade, we give them the same common chance of civilization with other parts of the world; and that we shall now allow to Africa the opportunity—the hope—the prospect of attaining to the same blessings which we ourselves, through the favourable dispensations of Divine Providence, have been permitted, at a much more early period, to enjoy. If we listen to the voice of reason and duty, and pursue this night the line of conduct which they prescribe, some of us may live to see a reverse of that picture from which we now turn our eyes with shame and regret. We may live to behold the natives of Africa engaged in the calm occupations of industry, in the pursuits of a just and legitimate commerce. We may behold the beams of science and philosophy breaking in upon their land, which, at some happy period in still later times, may blaze with full lustre; and joining their influence to that of pure religion, may illuminate and invigorate the most distant extremities of that immense continent. Then may we hope that even Africa, though last of all the quarters of the globe, shall enjoy at length, in the evening of her days, those blessings which have descended so plentifully upon us in a much earlier period of the world. Then also will Europe, participating in her improvement and prosperity, receive an ample recompense for the tardy kindness, if kindness it can be called, of no longer hindering that continent from extricating herself out of the darkness which, in other more fortunate regions, has been so much more speedily dispelled.

Illic sera rubens accendit lumina Vesper.'

I have heard it related by some who at that time were Members of Parliament, that the first beams of the rising sun shot through the windows of the House in the midst of this final passage, and seemed, as Pitt looked upwards, to suggest to him without premeditation the eloquent simile and the noble Latin lines with which he concluded.

But all this and much more was in vain. Dividing at near seven in the morning, the House adopted the 'gradually' of Mr. Dundas by 193 against 125. The result of the whole was, therefore, a long and weary postponement. For this result besides the strength and the exertions of the West India planters there are two other main causes to be assigned. First, the warning, as was supposed, held out by the recent bloody scenes in St. Domingo; and next, the strong objections, now coming to be generally known, of the King.

In this Session the Legislature, to its honour, achieved two great improvements in the administration of the law. The duty of a Magistrate in Middlesex had become very different from the duty of a Magistrate in other counties. It had grown so irksome and laborious that few gentlemen of property and character were found willing to undertake it without emolument. Thus it had fallen into the hands of inferior persons who acted in the expectation of fees, and were known by the name of 'trading justices.' To remedy the complaints which they justly provoked, a Bill was now introduced under the sanction of the Government enabling the King to establish seven public offices for the administration of justice in different parts of London, the City excepted, and to appoint three Magistrates to each of them at stated salaries. These Magistrates were to employ a limited number of constables, who should have power to apprehend reputed thieves. The measure in its progress was warmly withstood by Fox, who objected first that the influence of the Crown would be increased by the appointment of Magistrates with salaries, and next that under the vague term of reputed thieves, the liberty of the subject might be invaded. Nevertheless, the measure passed, but as a mere experiment, to remain in force only for four years, at the end of which term it was, with very general assent, re-enacted.

The second and far greater improvement achieved this year in legislation was from the renewal of Fox's Libel Bill. It was supported by Pitt, and passed the Commons with ease. But in the Lords it had to encounter the hostility of Thurlow. At first his hostility was in some measure dissembled. He took refuge in the means which in his profession are termed 'dilatory pleas.' He was anxious to consult the Judges; he was anxious to deliberate more fully. At length when after long delays the Second Reading came, he endeavoured to throw out the Bill, combining for that object with Lord Bathurst, his predecessor on the Woolsack, and Lord Kenyon, his friend the Chief Justice. On the other hand, the Second Reading was moved by the venerable Camden, still the President of the Council. He was now almost fourscore, and bowed beneath the infirmities of age; but as he spoke, leaning on his staff, maintaining to the last those rights of Juries which he had so constantly defended, his flagging spirit seemed to revive, and his former eloquence to kindle.

This debate, which began on the 16th of May, was concluded on the 21st, when the Bill was carried by a majority of 57 votes against 32. 'Fox and Pitt,' says Lord Macaulay, 'are fairly entitled to divide the high honour of having added to our Statute-Book the inestimable law which places the liberty of the Press under the protection of juries.'

On the day when this debate commenced, Thurlow was from other circumstances in the very crisis of his Ministerial fate. We have already seen how froward and resentful his conduct to Pitt had grown. It does not appear that he had or could have any settled plan to join or to form any other Government than Mr. Pitt's. But while indulging to the utmost his jealous spleen, he reckoned on the continued favour and forgiveness of the King.

In the present Session it had been part of Pitt's financial policy to frame a Bill in respect to future loans. He desired for the sake of the public credit to enact that in borrowing hereafter, one per cent., besides the dividends upon the new Stock, should be paid to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, so that every new loan might be accompanied by its own Sinking Fund. The Bill for this object passed the Commons without difficulty. In the Lords there was no notice either in public or in private of any objection on the part of Thurlow. Suddenly, the Bill being in Committee, on the 15th of May the Chancellor started up and ridiculed the idea of binding a future Minister by the directions of the present Parliament. 'In short,' said he, 'the scheme is nugatory and impracticable; the inaptness of the project is equal to the vanity of the attempt.' And finally calling for a division in a thin House, the Clause in question was carried by a majority of only six.

Being immediately apprised of these proceedings in the House of Lords, the King wrote the same evening to Mr. Pitt, strongly condemning the conduct of the Chancellor, yet still hoping that an entire breach would be avoided. But the bounds of endurance had been far outstepped. Next morning Mr. Pitt wrote to the King in most decided terms, and at the same time announced to Lord Thurlow in the following letter the course which he had felt it his duty to pursue:—

Downing Street, Wednesday,
May 16, 1792.

My Lord,—I think it right to take the earliest opportunity of acquainting your Lordship that being convinced of the impossibility of His Majesty's service being any longer carried on to advantage while your Lordship and myself both remain in our present situations, I have felt it my duty to submit that opinion to His Majesty, humbly requesting His Majesty's determination thereupon.

I have the honour, &c., W. Pitt.

The King's decision was promptly taken. On the same day he addressed to Mr. Secretary Dundas the following letter, which I have found among the papers of Mr. Dundas of Arniston:—

Queen's House, May 16, 1792,
40 m. past 6, P.M.

From the sorrow I feel at taking up my pen to direct Mr. Dundas to wait on the Lord Chancellor, I can easily conceive how unpleasant the conveying the following message must be.

Mr. Dundas is to acquaint the Lord Chancellor that Mr. Pitt has this day stated the impossibility of his sitting any longer in Council with the Lord Chancellor: it remains therefore for my decision which of the two shall retire from my service. The Chancellor's own penetration must convince him that however strong my personal regard, nay affection, is for him, that I must feel the removal of Mr. Pitt impossible with the good of my service. I wish therefore that the Great Seal may be delivered to me at the time most agreeable to the Lord Chancellor, and least inconvenient to either the business of the House of Lords or Court of Chancery. Perhaps the Long Vacation might be the time most proper; but of this the Lord Chancellor must be the best judge.

GEORGE R.

In this manner fell the arrogant Thurlow, a victim of his own arrogance, without support from any one of his colleagues, without sympathy from any section of the people. We are told that his complaints were loud, though surely most unreasonable, of the ingratitude and faithlessness of Princes. He was allowed to remain in office a few weeks longer to give judgment in some causes which he had already heard. But immediately after the Prorogation he was directed to repair to St. James's Palace and give back to the King the Great Seal, which was forthwith placed in the hands of three Commissioners. Thurlow received, however, a parting favour from his Sovereign—a new patent of peerage, with remainder to his nephews. Of his own he had only illegitimate children.

Among those who in England had inclined to schemes of Parliamentary Reform, the great majority was alienated and alarmed by the progress of events in France. On the minority those events produced an opposite effect, and thus, as most often occurs in such cases, the Reformers increased in vehemence precisely as they diminished in numbers. During this winter there was formed in London an association of about one hundred persons, comprising twenty-eight members of Parliament, and calling themselves the 'Friends of the People.' Fox himself did not belong to this new body, but his most intimate friends were among its founders. There were Grey, Sheridan, and James Lord Maitland, who, born in 1759, had succeeded his father in 1789 as Earl of Lauderdale, and was now the principal spokesman of Fox in the House of Lords. 'For my part,' writes the King, 'I cannot see any substantial difference in their being joined in debate by Mr. Fox and his not being a member of that Society.' They issued an Address declaring their aim to be a more equal system of representation, and passed a Resolution calling on Mr. Grey to introduce the question in the ensuing year. Mr. Grey accordingly gave notice in the House of Commons that in the course of the next Session he would bring forward a motion in favour of Parliamentary Reform. Even the mere notice gave rise to a keen debate. The subject, it was thought, would prove embarrassing to Mr. Pitt; but he delivered his sentiments upon it candidly and clearly. 'I retain my opinion,' he said, 'of the propriety of a Reform in Parliament, if it could be obtained without mischief or danger. But I confess I am not sanguine enough to hope that a Reform at this time can safely be attempted. . . . . At this time, and on this subject, every rational man has two things to consider. These are the probability of success, and the risk to be run by the attempt. Looking at it in both views, I see nothing but discouragement. I see no chance of succeeding in the attempt in the first place; and I see great danger of anarchy and confusion in the second.'

This debate took place on the last day of April, at the threshold of serious public dangers, and when upon the Continent at least a war had already begun. Eager as were the Emigrants and the Sovereigns in communication with them to march against Revolutionary France, there was an equal eagerness for conflict on the part of the Jacobin chiefs. They had complained to the Court of Vienna of the presence of the Emigrants near their frontier, and were incensed at not receiving the full satisfaction they demanded. But, above all, the Jacobin leaders saw that a conflict would give them the best chance to prevail in their ultimate ends—to overthrow the established Monarchy and religion of France—and to set up a levelling republic. Others, such as General Dumouriez, might be less keen for internal changes, but looked forward, as they justly might, to personal distinction in a foreign war. War then became a favourite cry with the Clubs at Paris—war above all against Leopold, as the brother of Marie Antoinette.

Such being already the temper, for the most part, of the ruling men in France, there occurred in the month of March two events that tended still further to elate them. The Emperor Leopold died at Vienna in the prime of life and after only a few hours' illness. His eldest son Francis became King of Hungary and Bohemia, and, before his power was yet established or his election as Emperor secured, might seem a far less formidable enemy.

Of all the Sovereigns at that period, Gustavus of Sweden was by far the most ardent and active in his zeal against the French Revolution. He was fully prepared to put himself at the head of an invading army when his career was cut short by the resentment he had provoked at home. In the midst of a masked ball he received a mortal wound. A pistol-shot struck him from the hand of Ankarstrom, until recently a captain in his army. It may serve to show the feelings of the time among the Jacobins at Paris that they loudly extolled this assassination as a noble and praiseworthy deed, and that the bust of the assassin was placed in the hall of their meeting, side by side with Brutus.

The King of Sweden was succeeded by his only son Gustavus the Fourth, who was not yet of age; and his brother, the Duke of Sudermania, who undertook the Regency, immediately renounced all aggressive schemes. Exulting at the secession of Sweden, and still more at the blow which had produced it, the French rulers rushed headlong into hostilities with Austria. The ill-fated Louis was induced himself to recommend that course in a speech to the Assembly; and, on the 20th of April accordingly, the Assembly, in virtue of those sovereign rights which it had usurped, issued a Declaration of War against the King of Hungary and Bohemia. The King of Prussia was not mentioned, yet he had already announced, through his envoy at Paris, his determination to make common cause with the Empire if attacked.

It was by no means upon fleets and armies that the chiefs of the French Revolution mainly at this time relied. They built far higher hopes on the discontents and insurrections which they hoped to stir up in other countries as they had already in their own. 'Our maxim is a clear one,' said Merlin de Thionville, a short time afterwards; 'war with kings and peace with nations.' 'To these last,' cried another patriot, 'we must offer one plain choice—La Fraternité ou la Mort.' It was the old Mahometan option—the Koran or the sword.

Nor did they by any means confine their efforts to those nations with whose kings they were already at strife. As regarded England, a whole host of tracts and handbills, paragraphs and pamphlets, was, within a few weeks, poured forth by the English press. Most of them seem to have been framed in conformity with the examples set at Paris, and circulated by the agency of two political societies in London.

The first of these societies was newly formed, and bore the name of the 'London Corresponding Society.' It was computed at a later period to have about 6,000 members, nearly all of the lower ranks. But it was absolutely governed by a secret committee of only five or six, whose names were not made known to the Society at large.[1]

The second body, much less numerous and much less formidable, was called the 'Society for Constitutional Information.' 'This,' said Lord Chief Justice Eyre, 'seems to me to be a mere club.'[2] It had been founded some time since by Major John Cartwright, a gentleman of great zeal in the cause of Parliamentary Reform. It was not led by secret rulers nor did it rely on illiterate force, but had among its members many persons of education and accomplishments, as John Horne Tooke and Capel Lofft, Richard Sharpe and Thomas Holcroft, not all of whom, however, continued to attend the subsequent meetings.

But, whatever might be the origin of the publications at this period, their object was always the same. They appeared to have no other view than the incitement to tumult and sedition. All Kings were represented as tyrants; all Ministers as venal and corrupt; and all priests as hypocrites; while every kind of rule and subjection was denounced as slavery. Frequent attempts were made to distribute writings of this kind among the British soldiers or the British sailors.[3] And as to the other classes, the rich were held forth as the natural enemies of the poor, who were consequently urged to rise and cast off their chains. In the same spirit and at the same period did Thomas Paine send forth the second part of his 'Rights of Man.'

So outrageous were these publications, and more especially this last, that Mr. Pitt felt it his duty to advise an authoritative step against them. On the 21st of May there appeared a Royal Proclamation 'solemnly warning all our loving subjects' against 'divers wicked and seditious writings.'

The result of these writings, however, was not wholly for evil. Many men might be stirred and incited to sedition, but many others were shocked and terrified, and rallied round the Government. Many men who, though not disagreeing with Burke, had hitherto looked coldly on his efforts to stem the Revolutionary torrent, and regarded him mainly in the light of a disturber to their party politics, now for the first time felt—or for the first time manifested—sympathy with his opinions. So well known, indeed, were their just and patriotic alarms, that, before the Proclamation was issued, Mr. Pitt sent a copy of it to several members of the Opposition in both Houses, and requested their advice and assistance.[1] He wished some of these gentlemen to move and second the Address in reply; but this, though they expressed their approbation, they declined to do.

This widening schism in the Opposition ranks was plainly shown a few days afterwards, when Pepper Arden, then Master of the Rolls, moved an Address to the King in the House of Commons, thanking him for his Royal Proclamation, and assuring him of their warm support. Fox and Grey spoke with great vehemence against the Proclamation; the latter adding some bitter personal invectives on the Ministers. But other Members from the same benches—Lord Titchfield, eldest son of the Duke of Portland, Lord North, eldest son of the Earl of Guilford, Mr. Windham, and

Mr. Thomas Grenville—rose to declare their approbation of the course which the Government had taken. So strong seemed to be this feeling in the House, that Grey, though he had moved an amendment, did not call for a division.

The Address thus carried was sent to the Lords, and their concurrence to it was requested, so that it might be presented to the King as the joint Address of the two Houses. In the debate which ensued the Prince of Wales, rising for the first time in that assembly, expressed, in some graceful sentences, his abhorrence of the recent publications, and his approval of the Royal Proclamation—a course not a little significant when we remember the close connection of Fox with His Royal Highness. To the same effect spoke also the leading Members of the Opposition of that day—the Duke of Portland, Lord Spencer, Lord Stormont, Lord Rawdon, and Lord Porchester. On the other hand, Lord Lauderdale moved nearly the same amendment as had Mr. Grey, but he did not divide, and in the debate was supported only by Lord Lansdowne, who, since his retirement from office, stood unconnected with party, but who of late had shown himself inclined to go all lengths with the French Revolution.

The speech of Lord Lauderdale on this occasion was marked by especial acrimony. He fell with a kind of rage upon the Duke of Richmond, who, having once supported Annual Parliaments and Unrestricted Suffrage, and being now disinclined to all Reform, might seem, no doubt, a tempting object for attack. 'There is a camp,' cried Lauderdale, 'to be formed at Bagshot to overawe the people of the capital and to stifle their efforts for Reform. I declare I am glad the noble Duke is to command that camp. If apostacy can justify promotion, he is the most fit person for that command, General Arnold alone excepted.' The Duke started up at once and denounced these 'impertinent personalities.' The consequence was that Lord Lauderdale challenged the Duke of Richmond, and was himself challenged by General Arnold. In the former case the quarrel was adjusted by the interposition of friends, but in the latter case a duel ensued. General Arnold came attended by Lord Hawke as second, and Lord Lauderdale by Mr. Fox. The General fired first, without effect, and the Earl declined to return the shot, upon which the seconds interposed and the matter terminated.[1]

The concert between Mr. Pitt and some members of the Opposition was further continued. It was his wish, by their accession to office, to give new strength to his Government in the stormy times which he saw approaching. Burke urged this junction with zeal, though declaring that he would accept no office for himself. Another warm auxiliary appeared in Lord Loughborough—above all, since the Great Seal had been vacant by the dismissal of Lord Thurlow.

Lord Loughborough had several conferences (as related in Lord Malmesbury's Journal) with Pitt and Dundas. Here Pitt explained his views with entire frankness. He assured Loughborough that 'it was his wish to unite cordially and heartily, not in the way of bargain, but to form a strong and united Ministry. His only doubts were about Fox, who he was afraid had gone too far.' Even as to Fox, Pitt declared that he had no personal objection, if Fox would really take part with the Duke of Portland. Fox, however, showed himself averse to any junction; the Duke of Portland owned a junction to be the right course, but could not make up his mind to it; the statesmen went out of town, and thus for the time the matter ended. 'You see how it is,' said Burke; 'Mr. Fox's coach stops the way.'

The Session was closed by the King on the 15th of June. His Majesty said that he had seen with great concern the commencement of hostilities in different parts of Europe, but should make it his principal care to secure to his people the uninterrupted blessings of peace.

In August of this year died the Earl of Guilford—if not the greatest or the firmest, certainly the most amiable of Ministers. He left vacant the Lord Wardenship of the Cinque Ports, a place for life, and with a salary at that time of 3,000*l.* a year. The King, on the very day that he received the news, wrote to Mr. Pitt, declaring that he would receive no recommendation from him for the vacant office, being determined to bestow it on Mr. Pitt himself. Knowing that Mr. Pitt had gone to Burton Pynsent, the King sent his letter to Mr. Dundas for transmission, and added the following lines:—

Windsor, Aug. 6, 1792.

The enclosed is my letter to Mr. Pitt, acquainting him with my having fixed on him for the office of Warden of the Cinque Ports. Mr. Dundas is to forward it to the West, and accompany it with a few lines expressing that I will not admit of this favour being declined. I desire Lord Chatham may also write, and that Mr. Dundas will take the first opportunity of acquainting Lord Grenville with the step I have taken. G. R.

In this case, perhaps unprecedented in our annals, we find as great a pressure upon a Minister to accept, as there ever was upon a Sovereign to bestow an office. Mr. Pitt gratefully accepted the offer so kindly made; and on his return from Somersetshire he hastened to express his thanks to His Majesty at Windsor. From thence, where he appears to have been General Harcourt's guest, he wrote to Lady Chatham:—

St. Leonard's Hill, Aug 13, 1792.

I arrived here yesterday after a very pleasant journey, but from the heat of the weather too late to pay my duty at Windsor before dinner, as I had intended. I had an opportunity, however, of doing so on the terrace in the evening, and of receiving a personal confirmation of every gracious sentiment which had been so fully expressed already. I am here on a spot which appears beautiful even after Burton, but which could not make Burton appear less so in recollection, even independent of everything else which it has to endear it, and which can be found nowhere else.

The disposal of the vacant office was in an especial manner gratifying to the King. His Majesty had for a long time past been anxious to secure a provision for his Minister in the event of his own decease. When in May, 1790, Mr. Pitt asked by letter for the reversion of a rich sinecure, a Tellership of the Exchequer, in favour of one of Lord Auckland's sons, the King granted the request, but observed in his reply that he should have been better pleased if the appointment could have been of use to the Prime Minister himself.

The appointment of Mr. Pitt to the Cinque Ports also gave great pleasure to Mr. Pitt's followers and friends. But there was one exception, which Bishop Tomline thus relates: 'A noble Duke who then held a high situation in His Majesty's Household applied to Mr. Pitt for this office, and took every opportunity of expressing his resentment that Mr. Pitt would not decline it in his favour. Three years afterwards he refused to give his vote for a Professorship at Cambridge, which vote he had in right of his official situation, according to Mr. Pitt's wishes, assigning his disappointment with respect to the Cinque Ports as his reason. Yet the Noble Duke was suffered to retain his situation in the Household till his death in 1799.' Bishop Tomline has withheld the name. But I see no just grounds for that suppression; and it becomes a mere form where, with a man of high rank—and with Collins's Peerage on the table—such dates and details are given. It was the Duke of Dorset, once ambassador at Paris, and afterwards Lord Steward.

During these summer months the fate of France—a Monarchy or a Republic—was decided. The King had presumed to use the prerogative left him by the Constitution for the dismissal of his Ministers. He had also by the same prerogative refused to sanction two Decrees which had been passed by the Assembly: the one for the formation of a camp round Paris, the other for the transportation of the non-juring priests. Thus provoked, the mob of Paris rose in fierce tumult on the 20th of June. Bands of the lowest orders incited by the Jacobin Club assailed the Tuileries, and thronged file by file into the presence of their Sovereign, who had ordered his Swiss Guards to forbear from all resistance. During several hours was Louis exposed to every form of insult; compelled to drink a health from a bottle which was tendered him, and to put on a red woollen cap which had become the emblem of the Jacobins. At length towards the evening Pétion, Mayor of Paris, came to his tardy rescue, and addressing to the rabble a few words not of rebuke, but commendation, bade them disperse and go home.

General La Fayette was at this time commander of the army on the northern frontier. The insults to the King and the inroads upon the Constitution filled him with just concern. His feelings were those of an honourable man, but his conduct was that of a very weak one. He addressed a letter of remonstrance to the Assembly; he came to Paris and appeared with a speech at their bar; but took no measures to give effect to his opinions, and he sought no concert with the more active adherents of the King. On his return to his army he continued the same course of loquacious indecision, and speedily ceased to be an object of either hope or fear. Misled by overweening self-reliance, he still supposed that, like the superior genius of Mirabeau, he might stem the torrent which, on the contrary, hurried him along.

On the opposite side Francis King of Hungary had been elected Emperor on the 5th of July; and the King of Prussia combining with him had declared war against France. It was resolved to invade the French territory from the northern frontier with a large and well-disciplined army, and the command was entrusted to the Duke of Brunswick, the nephew and the pupil of Frederick the Great. With this army the Emigrants were intended to co-operate. But instead of placing them in the front ranks with the banner of the Fleurs de Lys unfurled to the friends of Monarchy in France, they were rather thrust to the rear as mere accessories to the war. The Prince de Condé with six thousand men was directed to act on the side of Alsace, and the Duke of Bourbon with four thousand on the side of Flanders, while another body was subsequently reserved for the siege of Thionville: all alike shut out from the prominent place—the proposed advance to Paris.

Still far more grievous were the errors of the Manifesto which the Duke of Brunswick, against his own better judgment, was induced to issue on the 25th of July. Far from any generous amnesty on the part of the French Princes, far from any respectful appeal to the loyalty of the French people, there was throughout a tone of arrogant superiority and vindictive violence. It drew most unjustly a distinction between the soldiers of the line and the National Guards; for these last, if taken with arms in their hands, were forthwith to be punished as rebels, whilst all the rigours of war, with the burning of their houses, were denounced against the inhabitants of towns or villages who should dare to defend themselves against the troops of the Allies. If the King and Queen were exposed to the smallest violence—if they were not at once placed in safety and restored to freedom—the city of Paris was to be given up to military execution and exposed to total destruction. Such threats from any foreign General, far indeed from at all intimidating, could not fail to stir up the utmost resentment and resistance in so martial a nation as the French.

At Paris there was no cessation in the endeavours of the Jacobins to inflame the public mind more and more against the Royal Family. Mob-law was almost supreme; another effort made it wholly so. A new insurrection which had been for some time past concerted broke forth on the 10th of August. The palace of the Tuileries was assailed by a furious multitude; the faithful Swiss were either slain in the defence or subsequently butchered in cold blood, as were also the Royal servants and retainers. To such a dismal fate had fallen the proud inheritance of Louis the Fourteenth! The King—in truth a King no longer—became a fugitive from his palace; and, accompanied by his Consort, by his two children, and by his sister the Princess Elizabeth, he took refuge in the hall of the Assembly. There he found, however, only another class of foemen. Decrees were passed to suspend him from his Royal functions, and to summon a new legislative body under the name of a Convention, and as the next step to a Republic. Meanwhile the Royal Family were sent as close prisoners to the ancient stronghold of the Templar Knights at Paris.

These events were followed at the commencement of September by atrocities which even amidst the many evil deeds of the first French Revolution have attained a pre-eminence of shame. It was the massacre in the prisons of Paris. During four whole days did bands of miscreants proceeding in regular array from dungeon to dungeon draw forth the captives one by one and put them to death with hideous gibes. Six thousand persons at the lowest computation are stated to have perished;[1] and the assassins, as though proud to display some proofs of merit, eagerly besmeared themselves with the blood of their victims. Above all did they gloat over the death-pangs of any Catholic priests they found, nor were they disarmed even at the saint-like charity of some of these praying in their last moments for their murderers. The claims of sex, of youth, of beauty, were allowed—but they were claims only for superior refinements of cruelty. Thus in the case of the Princesse de Lamballe, young and beautiful, of exemplary life and of devoted friendship to the unhappy Queen, her head and heart were fixed upon a pike, and borne in savage triumph round the windows of the Temple, so as to meet at every turn the eyes of the Royal captives.

But where, it may be asked, was La Fayette? Where was he who had so loudly professed his respect for the Constitution—his zeal for law and order? These principles were still alive in his mind, but so dashed with doubts and misgivings as to deprive them of all practical effect.

Three Commissioners had been sent from Paris to the army, ostensibly to remonstrate with the General, but with a secret mission, as was thought, to supersede him. La Fayette anticipated their purpose by arresting them. But this was a solitary and unavailing act of vigour. Already by his vacillations had he lost his influence alike with soldier and civilian, with Republican and Royalist. In perhaps too hasty despair he resigned the contest, and on the night of the 19th of August fled beyond the frontier with only a handful of partisans. He desired to pass to Holland and embark for the United States, but within a few hours the small party was seized and made prisoners by an outpost of the Prussian army.

The treatment of La Fayette and of his principal companions by the two Allied Sovereigns was certainly in the highest degree both ungenerous and unwise. Instead of welcoming their tardy but honest zeal for the liberation of Louis the Sixteenth they were detained as prisoners of State. They were transferred from one dungeon to another, and closely confined, first at Wesel, and lastly at Olmütz. What temptation had now other men in France who had joined in the first enthusiasm of the Revolution to take part against its last excesses?

What better treatment could they expect from the Allies than La Fayette had found?

There was another aggravation to the angry feelings aroused in France, first by the Manifesto of the Prussian, and next by the imprisonment of the French General. That aggravation came from the east of Europe. Might not the dismemberment of France by the Allied Sovereigns be justly apprehended, when at the very same period the dismemberment of Poland was actually effected?

There had been in the preceding year a reform of the Constitution of Poland, framed on sound principles, and with warm assent from the people. But a small and selfish band, murmuring against it, had appealed to Russia for aid; and Catherine had eagerly seized the pretext of dictation to her weaker neighbours. In the spring and summer of 1792 she sent to Poland first a haughty Declaration, and next a powerful army. On the other hand the Poles from King Stanislas downwards displayed a noble spirit for their national rights. A large body of troops was mustered which in two pitched actions encountered the Russians with great bravery and some success. The General-in-Chief was Prince Joseph Poniatowski, but far the highest renown was gained by Kosciusko, the second in command, who had already distinguished himself in the American contest under the orders of Washington. Unhappily at this juncture the King of Prussia was induced by the lure of Thorn and Dantzic to make common cause with Catherine. Thus the Poles became greatly overmatched in numbers; and King Stanislas, losing heart, had recourse to negotiations instead of arms. The ignominious result was the second partition of Poland. The King of Prussia acquired Thorn and Dantzic, and the Empress one-half of Lithuania. It is clear how much this iniquitous confederacy was aided and secured from foreign interruption by the clamour raised a few months before against the Russian armament in England.

Besides the several causes of suspicion and resentment which I have now enumerated, the tardiness of the Duke of Brunswick was another fatal obstacle to the cause of the Allies. His Manifesto was dated the 25th of July; and its only chances of success lay in prompt and energetic action. Yet at this most critical period four weeks more elapsed ere the Duke entered the French territory at the head of fifty thousand Prussian troops, and in concert with an Austrian corps under General Clerfait. King Frederick William in person accompanied, though he did not command, the army. On the 23rd of August Longwy opened its gates to the Prussians after a slight resistance, and on the 2nd of September Verdun. Had they been pressing forward only a few days sooner, when the French camp was all confusion and uncertainty from the flight of La Fayette, it is difficult to see what power could have prevented their advance to Paris. But General Dumouriez, who meanwhile had succeeded to the chief command against them, was now straining every nerve to revive the spirits of the soldiers and to defend the passes of the forest of Argonne.

Dumouriez had also summoned to his aid General Kellermann, with two and twenty thousand men—'the army of the Rhine.' On the 20th of September Kellermann encountered a great division of the Allies at Valmy; and after a brisk cannonade of several hours remained master of the field. It seemed a slight action, yet it decided this campaign. The doubts of the Duke of Brunswick now returned with double force; cabals of various kinds were busy in his camp, and many thousands of his soldiers who had eagerly devoured the unripe grapes were struck down by a raging dysentery. Under these circumstances the Duke, to the general surprise of Europe, not only determined to retire, but opened a negotiation with the enemy that he might retire unmolested. Before the end of the month this retreat began, and in a few days more the Prussian army, relinquishing Verdun and Longwy, was again beyond the frontiers of France.

It may readily be supposed how much the friends of the French Revolution exulted at this most strange event. Mr. Fox in his familiar letters of that period declares that not even the reverses of his own countrymen in America had pleased him so well. 'No!' he exclaims, 'no public event, not excepting Saratoga and Yorktown, ever happened that gave me so much delight. I would not allow myself to believe it for some days, for fear of disappointment.'[1]

The other Sovereigns not yet at war with France had recalled their Ministers from Paris on the suspension of the kingly office and imprisonment of the King. It was the natural course to take when the sole Power to which they were accredited had ceased to exist. Amongst others Earl Gower, the English ambassador in France, was summoned home by the English Cabinet. But his letter of recall, which he was directed to show to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, contained a renewed assurance of neutrality in the domestic affairs of France. In the same spirit M. de Chauvelin, the French ambassador in England, was at his request permitted by the English Cabinet to continue to reside in London without official character. And he received a further assurance from Lord Grenville that should he be desirous of making any communications of a pacific tendency, no obstacle of a merely formal nature should be interposed. It is clear that Mr. Pitt at this period was still resolutely bent against any participation in the war.

Early in September were elected the deputies to the newly summoned National Convention. The mode of election was nearly universal suffrage, and the choice in general fell on the most violent and thorough-going men, or on the most timid, which in times of popular intimidation amounts to the same thing. Paris sent amongst others, Robespierre and Danton, the two chiefs of the extreme Republicans; Billaud Varennes, who had just before distinguished himself in promoting the massacre of the prisoners; and the Duke of Orleans, who, renouncing his titles and family name, called himself Philippe Egalité. In other places there were two Englishmen chosen, Thomas Paine and Dr. Priestley, but only the former came to France and took his seat. The Convention met for the first time on the 20th of September, the same day that the armies fought at Valmy. Next morning, by an unanimous vote and without the smallest discussion, they decreed to abolish the institution of Royalty in France.

On the retreat of the Prussians from Champagne, Dumouriez repaired to Paris to concert measures for his favourite object, the invasion of the Netherlands. They were at this time feebly defended by the Duke of Saxe-Teschen at the head of insufficient Austrian forces. Dumouriez, having obtained the requisite powers and crossed the frontiers with his army, gave battle to Saxe-Teschen on the 6th of November at Jemmapes. The result was a complete victory on the side of the French. And now appeared the results of the policy of Joseph the Second in demolishing the fortifications. No barrier remained against the invading army. Dumouriez entered Brussels in triumph, and all Belgium to the Meuse was subdued.

In other quarters also the French arms were crowned with unexpected success. Advancing from Alsace, General de Custine took Worms and Mayence, and even pushed forward to Frankfort. Towards the Alps the King of Sardinia having, with more zeal than prudence, joined the Coalition since the 10th of August, a body of French troops entered Savoy and speedily reduced the province in concert with a Savoyard insurrection. Another body set in movement from the Var took Nice and Villafranca with equal ease.

These successes, so little looked for at a period of so much internal strife, raised to the highest pitch the arrogance of the Convention. As defying public opinion in all other countries, they resolved to bring to a public trial their deposed and imprisoned King. They issued on the 19th of November the famous Decree by which, in the name of the French people, they offered fraternity and assistance to every nation that desired to recover their freedom, or in other words, to cast off the sway of Royalty; and they ordered this Decree to be translated and printed in all languages. By another Decree on the 21st, they proclaimed an accession of territory to themselves. France had been recently divided into eighty-three departments, in the place of its ancient provinces, and Savoy was now declared the eighty-fourth, under the name of the Département du Mont Blanc. It was plain that, like the first followers of Mahomet, they sought to make conquests partly by conversion and partly by the sword.

But further still they showed an utter disregard of the rights of neutral nations. On their conquest of Belgium they sent a peremptory order that their General should obtain freedom of navigation to the sea, and even for armed vessels on both the rivers Scheldt and Meuse. Against this order stood the privileges secured to Holland by treaty, and also our own obligations to aid Holland whenever assailed.

It was in reference to the rights especially of Holland, and only a few days before the famous Decree of the 19th of November, which entirely altered the aspect of affairs, that we find Mr. Pitt write as follows to one of the most respected of his colleagues, the Marquis of Stafford.

Downing Street, Nov. 13, 1792.

My dear Lord,—The strange and unfortunate events which have followed one another so rapidly on the Continent are in many views matter of serious and anxious consideration.

That which presses the most relates to the situation of Holland, as your Lordship will find from the enclosed despatch from Lord Auckland, and as must indeed be the case in consequence of the events in Flanders. However unfortunate it would be to find this country in any shape committed, it seems absolutely impossible to hesitate as to supporting our ally in case of necessity, and the explicit declaration of our sentiments is the most likely way to prevent the case occurring. We have, therefore, thought it best to send without delay instructions to Lord Auckland to present a memorial to the States, of which I enclose a copy. I likewise enclose a copy of instructions to Sir Morton Eden at Berlin, and those to Vienna are nearly to the same effect. These are necessarily in very general terms, as, in the ignorance of the designs of Austria and Prussia, and in the uncertainty as to what events each day may produce, it seems impossible to decide definitively at present on the line which we ought to pursue, except as far as relates to Holland.

Perhaps some opening may arise which may enable us to contribute to the termination of the war between different powers in Europe, leaving France (which I believe is the best way) to arrange its own internal affairs as it can. The whole situation, however, becomes so delicate and critical, that I have thought it right to request the presence of all the members of the Cabinet who can, without too much inconvenience, give their attendance. It will certainly be a great satisfaction if your Lordship should be of that number. At all events I wish to apprise you as well as I can of what is passing, and shall be happy to receive your sentiments upon it either personally or by letter.

I am, with the greatest regard, &c., W. PITT.

It was not merely as allies that we felt at this period the aggressive spirit of France. M. de Chauvelin, and still more his far abler Secretary, M. de Talleyrand, were accused of caballing with the malcontent party in England. But it is most probable that in many cases secret emissaries of the Jacobins acted in their name. Addresses of congratulation on recent events in France, and especially on the 'glorious victory of the 10th of August,' were voted and sent over to the National Convention by several of the Societies formed in London within the last three years. The tide of seditious publications, which had been checked in the previous spring, now flowed anew. Amongst the rest we may observe a new edition of that eloquent incentive to tyrannicide, the tract entitled 'Killing no Murder,' which had been written by Colonel Titus, and is said to have disturbed the last days of Oliver Cromwell. It had also been reprinted by some desperate adherents of the Stuarts in 1743, and it is striking to find that on this one and only point the extremes of two parties diametrically opposed in their tenets—the Jacobites and the Jacobins—agreed.

Still more alarming were the disturbances that now broke forth in several parts of England. Such was the case, for example, at Yarmouth and at Shields. In Sheffield there was appointed a day of rejoicing to celebrate the success of the French arms. An ox was in the first place roasted whole and eaten, after which the numbers assembled walked in procession with the French tri-colors flying, and with a picture at the end of a pole which represented Dundas and Burke stabbing Liberty. An officer quartered at Sheffield wrote as follows to his brother next day:—'They are as resolute and determined a set of villains as I ever saw, and will gain their object if it is to be gained. They have debating societies and regular correspondence with the other towns; they have subscribed to purchase fire-arms, and are endeavouring to corrupt the soldiers.'[1]

From Scotland there came no better tidings. There had been riots at Dundee, Perth, and Aberdeen; and in all three places it had been requisite to send for military aid. At Dundee the first occasion or pretext of the tumult had been the high price of meal, but it was not long ere cries of 'Liberty and Equality!' arose from every quarter of the mob. Some even called out 'No Excise! No King!' and they concluded with planting a tree of Liberty, according to the pattern of France.[1]

Dundas had himself gone to Scotland at this time, and on his way back received at Northallerton the following letter from Pitt. The original is among the Arniston Papers.

Downing Street, Tuesday,
Dec. 4, 1792.

Dear Dundas,—I received your letter of last Saturday morning, and all those preceding it; and am very glad to think that on the whole you will have left everything in Scotland in a better train than could have been expected. The impression here from calling out the Militia is as favourable as we could wish, and people who a few days ago were inclined to despond begin to tell us that we shall only be attacked for having made so great an exertion when there was so little real danger. I believe myself that the chief danger at home is over for the present, but I am sure there is still mischief enough afloat not to relax any of our preparations, and things abroad still wear such an aspect that nothing but our being ready for war can preserve peace. On all this, however, we shall soon converse at large. The reason of my sending this letter is to ask whether you have or can procure a complete narrative of all that passed relative to the disturbances at Dundee, showing the exact extent of the outrages committed, as I think we have not at present in the Office as particular a statement of that transaction as one should wish. The calling out the Militia was so clearly right and necessary that people will not much be inclined to cavil as to the application of the term Insurrection, which was the ostensible ground of our taking the measure. I have, however, some reason to suppose that some part of Opposition will try to criticise the measure in that respect; and as we have hitherto looked more to the substance than to the form, I doubt whether we could, from our present materials, give as precise an answer as we should wish to cavils of this nature. The proceedings at Yarmouth and at Shields certainly both amounted to insurrections, but they were not on political questions, and therefore what passed at Dundee furnishes the specific ground which seems best to be relied on. After all there will be no difficulty in avowing that at any rate we thought it necessary to take this measure for the public safety.

I send this to meet you on the road, because you would have no time to write to Scotland, should it be necessary, and to receive an answer before Parliament meets.

Yours ever, W. PITT.

All this time the English conspirators were, it would seem, supplied with, and instigated by, money from abroad. Shortly afterwards it was boasted by one of the Republican leaders in France, Citizen Brissot (for the title of Monsieur was disregarded as savouring of aristocracy), that even before the Declaration of War large sums had been at intervals sent over to England from France. But although large sums may indeed have been abstracted from the French treasury, it seems highly improbable that the same amount ever reached the opposite shores. There was also, on the other hand, some reason to suspect that money had been transmitted from Ireland to French agents and for French uses.[1]

On the opposite side the loyal majority of Englishmen began in London to make some counter-demonstrations. The person who appears to have taken the lead in this movement was Mr. John Reeves, a barrister and Law-Clerk in Lord Hawkesbury's Office. Through his means there was summoned by public advertisement a meeting at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, on the 29th of November, when it was unanimously agreed to form an association 'for the defence of liberty and property against Republicans and Levellers.' This was followed by another meeting of bankers, traders, and other inhabitants of London, held at Merchant Taylors' Hall, on the 5th of December. There a Declaration expressive of warm attachment to the Constitution was framed and left open for signatures. It was in fact signed by vast numbers of the middle classes,

Nor was the law inactive. The Attorney-General moved a criminal information against Thomas Paine, as author of the 'Rights of Man,' and in due course the trial came on before Lord Kenyon, when, in spite of a long and most able defence from Erskine, the jury without hesitation brought in a verdict of Guilty. Paine had gone to Paris to attend the sittings of the French Convention, and did not present himself to receive the judgment of the Court, but a sentence of outlawry was pronounced against him.

The Government at this critical period was certainly not wanting in most active measures of precaution and defence. Steps were taken to increase our forces both by land and sea. Several regiments were concentrated near London to provide against any sudden rising. The bulwarks of the Tower were repaired. The guard at the Bank was reinforced.

Nor was this all. By advice of Mr. Pitt a Royal Proclamation was issued on the 1st of December, calling out a part of the Militia, and (as the law in that case required) summoning Parliament to meet within fourteen days. On the 13th accordingly the Session was opened by the King in person. His Majesty's speech was unusually long and explicit. He expressed his sincere desire for peace, but also his serious concern at the disposition which had been shown in France to excite disturbances in other countries, and to disregard the rights of neutral nations. And he declared that he had thought it right to take some steps for the augmentation of both his naval and military forces.

During the first days of this early Session Pitt was absent from the House on account of his new office as Lord Warden, and his consequent re-election; but Dundas supplied his place as leader. It was announced that besides the measures for national defence, the Ministers had prepared an Alien Bill, laying, for the first time, certain restrictions and liabilities upon all foreigners in England. Two other Bills were brought in with special reference to France; the one restraining the export of arms and ammunition, the other prohibiting the export of corn. In all these measures the friends and followers of the Duke of Portland, comprising the greater part of the Opposition in both Houses, showed a strong disposition to support the policy of the Government. Fox, on the other hand, warmly declared against it. On the very first evening he moved an Amendment to the Address, and had the mortification to find himself in a minority of no more than fifty Members. Nor did any better success attend him when, two days afterwards, he moved to acknowledge the French Republic, and to accredit a Minister at Paris. As Lord Malmesbury in his Journal states it: 'The cry against him out of doors was excessive, and his friends were hurt beyond measure: several left London.[1]

In the other House Lord Stanhope, though altogether unconnected with Fox's party, espoused with great ardour the cause of the French Revolution. He had wholly estranged himself from Mr. Pitt, but was still on terms of friendly intercourse with Lord Grenville, the uncle of his wife. To Lord Grenville at this time he wrote as follows:—

Mansfield Street, Dec. 19, 1792.

My dear Lord,—I have written to Mr. Stone to send you herewith a copy of the Decree of the National Convention, and also of the Questions of the Committee for the Colonies. They explain themselves. Mr. Stone is an Englishman, well acquainted with the Ministers and leading men in France, and whom your Lordship will do well at least to see, as he can convince you of their friendly disposition towards this country. Good God! my dear Lord, you have no conception of the misfortunes you may bring upon

[1] Diary, Dec. 15, 1792.

England by going to war with France. For as to France, I believe all Europe cannot subdue them, whatever efforts may be made. It will only rouse them more.

Believe me ever, my dear Lord, &c., &c., STANHOPE.

This letter bears an indorsement in Lord Grenville's hand, 'To be circulated'—that is, among the Cabinet Ministers. Thus it must have come before Mr. Pitt. But I know not whether any or what answer it received.

Another letter addressed to Pitt about this time would have excited no small amazement in any English Minister half a century before. An application for pecuniary aid from the Pretender's Queen! Thus writes Lord Camelford:—

Florence, Dec. 14, 1792.

My dear Sir,—I write to acquit myself of a commission I have received from the Comtesse Albany, who desires to assure you that the kind part you were so good to take in her business, both when she left England and since, lays her under obligations that she shall never forget.

After what is past, I conclude it is in vain to hope the subject can be renewed in any shape hereafter It is impossible for me, however, to be witness to the situation of that unfortunate lady without reflecting upon the effect her present distress must produce upon every feeling mind in Europe. By her flight from France, where, had she remained two days longer, her certain imprisonment had been the consequence, and she would have been included in the general massacre, she has lost every resource from that country. Driven afterwards from her family at Brussels, from the apprehensions of what has actually taken place immediately after, she has taken refuge here as the only asylum that could afford her any promise of safety; and here she lives upon the débris of what she could save out of her fortune at a sequin a day. I need make no comments—your generous mind will supply them. If she had a pension of 1000*l.*, she would be happy. Pardon me, my dear Sir, if I cannot resist the impulse that has made me state this to you, having no means of laying it before the person whose good heart would, I am sure, be not insensible to it, if he could be witness to it as I am. It is a strange world, and the vicissitudes of it are striking in a manner never before experienced.

Ever most affectionately yours, CAMELFORD.

Lord Camelford did not long survive the date of this letter. He died in the January following, and the letter was forwarded by Lord Hervey after his death. It does not appear that any present aid was afforded to the widow of Charles Edward. But when, in 1800, Cardinal York, in consequence of the French invasion, had found it requisite to leave Rome, and to forego his ecclesiastical revenues, the King, on the recommendation of Mr. Pitt, granted a yearly pension of 4,000*l.* to the last of the Stuarts. The Cardinal died in 1807. Then Lord Hawkesbury wrote to announce that a part of this pension, namely, 1,600*l.* a year, would be continued by His Majesty to the Countess of Albany.[1]

In December 1792 the negotiations with the Duke of Portland and Lord Loughborough were resumed. The Duke was swayed throughout by most honourable motives, but from his vacillations played a very unsatisfactory part. He was tossed like a tennis-ball from side to side; almost quite determined to join the Ministry whenever he met Lord Malmesbury; almost quite determined not whenever he met Mr. Fox. Lord Malmesbury, in his Journal, has described one scene to the life; how, on the day after Christmas, the Duke had promised to make a speech of adhesion; how he went down accordingly with his diplomatic friend to the House of Lords, and how, at the last moment, he faltered, and sat still.

Lord Loughborough, though not quite so disinterested, was much more steady in his view; that view being merely, as I presume to think, a great office for himself. Finding that a more general concert could not at this time be compassed, he agreed to become Lord Chancellor at once, leaving the accession of others to the effects of time. The Great Seal was accordingly placed in his hands before the ensuing month of January had closed.

[1] See M. de Reumont's very interesting Biography, in German, of the Countess of Albany, vol. i. p. 389, ed. 1860. It appears from this book that so lately as 1823 the Duchess of Devonshire used to address her as Cara Regina, or Cara Sovrana.

The maintenance of peace was not yet to be despaired of. M. Chauvelin had remained in London, and desired to present his credentials as Minister of the French Republic; and there also at this juncture came from Paris, though without official character, M. Maret, better known in subsequent years as the Duke de Bassano. But the French Government, flushed with its late victories, was ill inclined to relinquish its ambitious views on Holland, which we were bound by treaty to protect. And meanwhile there took place at Paris a transaction which, beyond any other cause, rent France and England asunder. The dethroned King, after being harassed during many days by the forms of a mock trial, under the nickname of Louis Capet, was declared to be guilty, was condemned to death by a narrow majority of the Convention (that majority including his craven kinsman Philippe Egalité), and his head fell beneath the guillotine on the morning of the 21st of January. An uncontrollable thrill of horror ran through the nations of Europe. Mourning was commonly worn in England in grief for this judicial murder. 'An event,' said Lord Loughborough, a few days afterwards in the House of Lords, 'which has not only changed the garb of the nation, but seemed to impress every individual in it with sorrow.'[1]

In London, on the 24th of January, immediately after the first tidings, there was issued an order of the King in Council commanding M. Chauvelin to depart within eight days from His Majesty's dominions. As it chanced, a positive recall had likewise on the preceding day been despatched to him by his chiefs at Paris. Both parties, indeed, were now equally convinced that a conflict had become not only inevitable, but close impending. On the 1st of February the French Government took the final step by a Declaration of War against England and Holland. A similar Declaration against Spain followed on the 7th of March ; and thus, the last hopes of peace departing, did the trumpets once more sound to battle.

APPENDIX.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS OF LETTERS FROM KING GEORGE THE THIRD TO MR. PITT.

[Where in these copies the whole of the King's letter is given, 'G.R.,' his usual signature in this correspondence, is added at the end. Where it is omitted the reader will understand that only an extract is inserted, and that the remainder is in general of no public interest.]

Queen's House, March 23, 1783, 8.50 A.M.

Mr. Pitt is desired to come here in his morning dress as soon as convenient to him. G. R.

St. James's, March 23, 1783, 11.55 A.M.

Mr. Pitt, I have seen Lord North, and sent him to the Duke of Portland to desire the plan of arrangements may be instantly sent to me, as I must coolly examine it before I can give any answer, and as I expect to have the whole finally decided before to-morrow's debate in the House of Commons. This seems to answer the idea I have just received from Mr. Pitt. G. R.

I desire Mr. Pitt will be here after the Drawing Room.

Queen's House, March 24, 1783, 11.10 A.M.

Mr. Pitt's idea of having nothing announced till the debate of to-day meets with my thorough approbation. I have just seen the Lord Chancellor, who thinks that if Mr. Pitt should say, towards the close of the debate, that after such conduct as the Coalition has held, that every man attached to this Constitution must stand forth on this occasion, and that as such he is determined to keep the situation devolved on him, that he will meet with an applause that cannot fail to give him every encouragement.

I shall not expect Mr. Pitt till the Levee is over.

G. R.

Windsor, March 24, 1783, 5.12 P.M.

I am not surprised, as the debate has proved desultory, that Mr. Pitt has not been able to write more fully on this occasion. After the manner I have been personally treated by both the Duke of Portland and Lord North, it is impossible I can ever admit either of them into my service: I therefore trust that Mr. Pitt will exert himself to-morrow to plan his mode of filling up the offices that will be vacant, so as to be able on Wednesday morning to accept the situation his character and talents fit him to hold, when I shall be in town before twelve ready to receive him. G. R.

Mr. Pitt to the King.

Mr. Pitt received, this morning, the honour of your Majesty's gracious commands. With infinite pain he feels himself under the necessity of humbly expressing to your Majesty, that with every sentiment of dutiful attachment to your Majesty and zealous desire to contribute to the public service, it is utterly impossible for him, after the fullest consideration of the situation in which things stand, and of what passed yesterday in the House of Commons, to think of undertaking, under such circumstances, the situation which your Majesty has had the condescension and goodness to propose to him.

As what he now presumes to write is the final result of his best reflection, he should think himself criminal if, by delaying till to-morrow humbly to lay it before your Majesty, he should be the cause of your Majesty's not immediately turning your Royal mind to such a plan of arrangement as the exigency of the present circumstances may, in your Majesty's wisdom, seem to require.

Windsor, March 25, 4.35 P.M.

Mr. Pitt, I am much hurt to find you are determined to decline at an hour when those who have any regard for the Constitution as established by law ought to stand forth against the most daring and unprincipled faction that the annals of this kingdom ever produced. G. R.

December 23, 1783, 10.46 A.M.

To one on the edge of a precipice every ray of hope must be pleasing. I therefore place confidence in the Duke of Richmond, Lord Gower, Lord Thurlow, and Mr. Pitt bringing forward some names to fill up an arrangement; which if they cannot, they already know my determination. One will be an hour perfectly agreeable to me. G. R.

Windsor, January 13, 1784.

Mr. Pitt cannot but suppose that I received his communication of the two divisions in the long debate which ended this morning with much uneasiness, as it shows the House of Commons much more willing to enter into any intemperate resolutions of desperate men than I could have imagined. As to myself, I am perfectly composed, as I have the self-satisfaction of feeling I have done my duty.

Though I think Mr. Pitt's day will be fully taken up in considering, with the other Ministers, what measures are best to be proposed in the present crisis, yet that no delay may arise from my absence I will dine in town, and consequently be ready to see him in the evening, if he shall find that will be of utility. At all events, I am ready to take any step that may be proposed to oppose this faction, and to struggle to the last period of my life; but I can never submit to throw myself into its power. If they in the end succeed, my line is a clear one, and to which I have fortitude enough to submit. G. R.

January 24, 1784, 9.17 A.M.

I own I cannot see any reason, if the thing is practicable, that a Dissolution should not be effected; if not, I fear the Constitution of this country cannot subsist.

January 24, 1784, 6.25 P.M.

I desire Mr. Pitt will assemble the confidential Ministers this evening, that he may state what has passed this day. I should think it cannot give any reason for preventing a Dissolution on Monday; but if it should, he must be armed with the opinion of the other Ministers. I fear Mr. Powys's candour has drawn him into a trap; delay must be of the worst of consequences, and the Opposition cannot but be glad he should be the author of it. If Mr. Pitt can come after the meeting before eleven this night, I shall be ready to see him; if not, as early to-morrow morning as may suit him. G. R.

January 25, 1784.

Though indecision is the most painful of all situations to a firm mind, I by no means wish Mr. Pitt should come to me till he has, with his brother Ministers, gone through the various objects the present crisis affords. I should hope by half an hour past nine he may be able to lay before me the result of their deliberations.

The Opposition will certainly throw every difficulty in our way, but we must be men; and if we mean to save the country, we must cut those threads that cannot be unravelled. Half-measures are ever puerile, and often destructive.

G. R.

January 26, 1784.

Mr. Pitt's language in the House of Commons this day seems to have been most proper. The idea of Ministers resigning, and consequently leaving everything in confusion, was worthy of the mouth from whence it came, but cannot meet with the approbation of the sober-minded. G. R.

January 30, 1784.

The account of what passed in the House of Commons yesterday, which I suppose by reading the various newspapers may be pretty nearly collected, gives every reason for commending Mr. Pitt's language and for reprobating that of Mr. Fox and his follower, Lord North; and shows that their principles must ever prevent that kind of union to which alone I can ever consent.

I shall certainly not object to Mr. Pitt's making himself master, if possible, of what the Duke of Portland means, though I cannot suggest the mode. I cannot say the meeting of the gentlemen at the St. Alban's Tavern seem as yet to have taken the only step which ought to occur to them:

the co-operating in preventing a desperate faction from completing the ruin of the most perfect of all human formations—the British Constitution. G. R.

February 4, 1784.

I trust the House of Lords will this day feel that the hour is come for which the wisdom of our ancestors established that respectable corps in the State, to prevent either the Crown or the Commons from encroaching on the rights of each other. Indeed, should not the Lords stand boldly forth, this Constitution must soon be changed; for, if the two only remaining privileges of the Crown are infringed—that of negativing Bills which have passed both Houses of Parliament, and that of naming the Ministers to be employed—I cannot but feel, as far as regards my person, that I can be no longer of any utility to this country, nor can with honour continue in this island.

February 15, 1784.

Mr. Pitt is so well apprized of the mortification I feel at any possibility of ever again seeing the heads of Opposition in public employments, and more particularly Mr. Fox, whose conduct has not been more marked against my station in the Empire than against my person, that he must attribute my want of perspicuity in my conversation last night to that foundation; yet I should imagine it must be an ease to his mind, in conferring with the other confidential Ministers this morning, to have on paper my sentiments, which are the result of unremitted consideration since he left me last night, and which he has my consent to communicate, if he judges it right, to the above respectable persons.

My present situation is perhaps the most singular that ever occurred, either in the annals of this or any other country; for the House of Lords, by not a less majority than near two to one, have declared in my favour; and my subjects at large, in a much more considerable proportion, are not less decided; to combat which, Opposition have only a majority of twenty or at most of thirty in the House of Commons, who, I am sorry to add, seem as yet willing to prevent the public supplies. Though I certainly have never much valued popularity, yet I do not think it is to be despised when arising from a rectitude of conduct, and when it is to be retained by following the same respectable path which conviction makes me esteem that of duty, as calculated to prevent one branch of the legislature from annihilating the other two, and seizing also the executive power to which it has no claim.

I confess I have not yet seen the smallest appearance of sincerity in the leaders of Opposition, to come into the only mode by which I could tolerate them in my service, their giving up the idea of having the administration in their hands, and coming in as a respectable part of one on a broad basis; and therefore I, with a jealous eye, look on any words dropped by them either in Parliament or to the gentlemen of the St. Alban's Tavern, as meant only to gain those gentlemen, or, if carrying further views, to draw Mr. Pitt, by a negotiation, into some difficulty.

Should the Ministers, after discussing this, still think it advisable that an attempt should be made to try whether an administration can be formed on a real, not a nominal wide basis, and that Mr. Pitt having repeatedly and as fruitlessly found it impossible to get even an interview on what Opposition pretends to admit is a necessary measure, I will, though reluctantly, go personally so far as to authorise a message to be carried in my name to the Duke of Portland, expressing a desire that he and Mr. Pitt may meet to confer on the means of forming an administration on a wide basis, as the only means of entirely healing the divisions which stop the business of the nation. The only person I can think, from his office as well as personal character, proper to be sent by me, is Lord Sydney; but should the Duke of Portland, when required by me, refuse to meet Mr. Pitt, more especially upon the strange plea he has as yet held forth, I must here declare that I shall not deem it right for me ever to address myself again to him.

The message must be drawn on paper, as must everything in such a negotiation, as far as my name is concerned; and I trust when I next see Mr. Pitt, if under the present circumstances the other Ministers shall agree with him in thinking such a proposition advisable, that he will bring a sketch of such a message for my inspection. G. R.

February 18, 1784.

As Mr. Pitt's letter seems to suppose the House of Commons will this day come to some resolution either consonant to that proposed the last night, though warned by Mr. Powys, or to an Address, I should think Mr. Pitt, instead of coming to Court this day, had better employ part of the time in seeing such Members of that House who may be thought proper to take an active part in the debate, and also consult with the Cabinet, in case the House should come into either of those violent measures, as to the steps then necessary to be taken. He may depend on my being heartily ready to adopt the most vigorous ones, as I think the struggle is really no less than my being called upon to stand forth in defence of the Constitution against a most desperate and unprincipled faction. Mr. Pitt being then prepared, he may see me as soon as he pleases after this debate is over. G. R.

February 22, 1784.

I am not surprised that the Ministers should wish to have all the possible time for consideration on any steps that the Address of the House of Commons and the answer to it may draw on, and therefore that it is wished I should not receive the Commons till Wednesday. I very willingly consent to fixing on that day for the reception of it; and trust that while the answer is drawn up with civility, it will be a clear support of my own rights, which the Addresses from all parts of the kingdom show me the people feel essential to their liberties. G. R.

February 29, 1784.

I was much hurt at hearing since the Drawing Room[1] of the outrage committed the last night under the auspices of Brooks's against Mr. Pitt on his return from the City, but am very happy to find he escaped without injury. I trust every means will be employed to find out the abettors of this, which I should hope may be got at.

As I suppose to-morrow will be a late day at the House of Commons, and consequently that I cannot be wanted on Tuesday, I mean to-morrow after Court to go to Windsor for the sake of hunting that day. G. R.

Windsor, March 9, 1784.

Mr. Pitt's letter is undoubtedly the most satisfactory I have received for many months. An avowal on the outset that the proposition held forth is not intended to go further lengths than a kind of manifesto; and then carrying it by the majority only of one, and the day concluding with an avowal that all negotiation is at an end, gives me every reason to hope that by a firm and proper conduct this faction will by degrees be deserted by many, and at length be forgot. I shall ever with pleasure consider that by the prudence as well as rectitude of one person in the House of Commons this great change has been effected, and that he will be ever able to reflect with satisfaction that in having supported me he has saved the Constitution, the most perfect of human formations.

[1] Held on the same day, a Sunday, according to the custom at that time.

Mr. Pitt will consider of the declaration, that my answer may meet every assertion, as I trust it will be the last visit on this unpleasant business. G. R.

Windsor, March 10, 1784.

It is with infinite satisfaction I learn from Mr. Pitt's note the event of the Mutiny Bill having yesterday gone through the Committee without any opposition, which may with reason be called a great victory, it having been more than once avowed in the House that it would be passed only for a month. I am sorry my time was spent in talking of so impracticable a scheme and so absurd a letter as that of the Duke of Portland; but if it has shown the impossibility of further negotiation, I hope it has proved not quite useless.

G. R.

March 23, 1784.

This instant I have received Mr. Pitt's letters, and a draft of the Speech, which entirely meets with my ideas: I therefore desire the proper copy may be prepared for to-morrow. I have, in consequence of Mr. Pitt's intimation that the Bills will be ready for my assent, sent orders for the equipages to be at St. James's to-morrow at half hour past two. I desire notice may be given that I may be expected a quarter before three at Westminster, that those necessary to attend may be there. G. R.

March 28, 1784.

Though Mr. Pitt must agree with me that Mr. Scott would have been the fittest person for Solicitor-General, yet considering the situation of Lord Gower, and the very early decided part Mr. Macdonald has taken, the latter gentleman cannot be passed by; therefore the offering it to him without delay seems right.

April 5, 1784.

I cannot refrain from the pleasure of expressing to Mr. Pitt how much his success at Cambridge has made me rejoice, as he is the highest on the return, and that Lord Euston is his colleague. This renders his election for the University a real honour, and reconciles me to his having declined Bath.

I shall only add that as yet the returns are more favourable than the most sanguine could have expected.

G. R.

May 26, 1784.

Mr. Pitt's note on the decision of the House of Commons by so large a majority to hear the petition on the Bedfordshire election on an early day is very pleasing, as also that the petition of Mr. Fox is to be examined by the whole House on Friday. I cannot conclude without expressing my fullest approbation of the conduct of Mr. Pitt on Monday: in particular his employing only a razor against his antagonists, and never condescending to run into that rudeness which, though common in that House, certainly never becomes a gentleman. If he proceeds in this mode of oratory, he will bring debates into a shape more creditable, and correct that, and I trust many other evils, which time and temper can only effect. G. R.

Kew, July 1, 1784.

It is with infinite satisfaction that I learn from Mr. Pitt's letter that the various Resolutions proposed yesterday to the House of Commons on the subjects of the loan, the subscription for the unfunded debt, and the taxes, were unanimously agreed to. Nothing is more natural than that, such heavy charges requiring many new taxes, those particularly affected by some will from that selfish motive, though conscious of the necessity of new burthens, attempt to place them on others rather than on themselves. Mr. Fox's moderation and candour will cease if any strong opposition to particular taxes should arise; but I trust Mr. Pitt will be able to carry all of them. It seemed to be an opinion yesterday that the brick tax was the one most likely to be opposed, but Mr. Pitt not having mentioned it, I suppose that branch of trade has not so many friends in the House as the coal pits, which are the property of more considerable persons, and therefore more clamorous, though not less able to support a new charge on their profits. G. R.

Windsor, July 17, 1784.

It is with infinite pleasure I have received Mr. Pitt's note containing the agreeable account of the Committee on the East India Bill having been opened by the decision of so very decided a majority. I trust this will prevent much trouble being given in its farther progress, and that this measure may lay a foundation for, by degrees, correcting those shocking enormities in India that disgrace human nature, and, if not put a stop to, threaten the expulsion of the Company out of that wealthy region. I have the more confidence of success from knowing Mr. Pitt's good sense, which will make him not expect that the present experiment shall at once prove perfect; but that by an attentive eye, and an inclination to do only what is right, he will, as occasions arise, be willing to make such improvements as may by degrees bring this arduous work into some degree of perfection. G. R.

September 10, 1784.

I am not surprised that Mr. Orde's informations on the supposed plot reach Sir Edward Newenham as well as Lord Bristol; but such heads, as Mr. Pitt very well observes, are not likely to form well-regulated plans. Yet they ought to be well watched, for they may be desperate ones.

February 18, 1785.

Great as my surprise is at the Castle having acted entirely contrary to the most direct instructions from hence in the Resolutions for finally settling the commercial regulations between Great Britain and Ireland, yet it is, if possible, exceeded by Mr. Orde in his letter to Mr. Pitt seeming to expect that Britain can consent to them so entirely changed.

G. R.

February 22, 1785.

I am glad precedents authorise the Resolutions of the Irish Parliament being communicated to the two Houses without any message on the occasion, as I could by no means show approbation to them in their present shape, and I do not see any reason for giving an opinion till the Parliament of this Kingdom has, by the enclosed draft of a Resolution, decided the line to be held, which, as it has legislative considerations, ought to commence with them. G. R.

March 4, 1785.

From what Mr. Pitt has heard me say on the continuation of the Westminster Scrutiny, he will not be surprised that an end being put to it is not a subject of great inquietude, though I do not the less feel that it has been effected by many friends voting with the Coalition, which is not a pleasant reflection; but one must hope they will not in future allow themselves to follow so improper an example. I should hope Mr. Fox rather hurt his cause by taking so strong a step as proposing to expunge from the Journals the several Resolutions which have been made relative to the Scrutiny: he having at length postponed the consideration of it till Wednesday seems to authorise this opinion.

G. R.

I have received Mr. Pitt's paper containing the heads of his plan for a Parliamentary Reform, which I look on as a mark of attention. I should have delayed acknowledging the receipt of it till I saw him on Monday, had not his letter expressed that there is but one issue of the business he could look upon as fatal: that is, the possibility of the measure being rejected by the weight of those who are supposed to be connected with Government. Mr. Pitt must recollect that though I have thought it unfortunate that he had early engaged himself in this measure, yet that I have ever said that as he was clear of the propriety of the measure, he ought to lay his thoughts before the House; that out of personal regard to him, I should avoid giving any opinion to any one on the opening of the door to Parliamentary Reform except to him: therefore I am certain Mr. Pitt cannot suspect my having influenced any one on the occasion; if others choose for base ends to impute such a conduct to me, I must bear it as former false suggestions. Indeed on a question of such magnitude, I should think very ill of any man who took a part on either side without the maturest consideration, and who would suffer his civility to any one to make him vote contrary to his own opinion. The conduct of some of Mr. Pitt's most intimate friends on the Westminster Scrutiny shows there are questions men will not by friendship be biassed to adopt. G. R.

This morning I received the enclosed note from Lord Southampton, on which I appointed him to be at St. James's when I returned from the House of Peers. He there delivered to me the letter from the Prince of Wales. All I could collect further from him was that the idea is that I call for explanations and retrenchments as a mode of declining engaging to pay the debts; that there are many sums that it cannot be honourable to explain; that Lord Southampton has reason to believe they have not been incurred for political purposes; that he thinks the going abroad is now finally resolved on; that perhaps the champion of the Opposition has been consulted on the letter now sent. I therefore once more send all that has passed to Mr. Pitt, and hope to have in the course of to-morrow from him what answer ought to be sent to this extraordinary epistle, which, though respectful in terms, is in direct defiance of my whole correspondence. I suppose Mr. Pitt will choose to consult the Chancellor. G. R.

March 25, 1785.

Mr. Pitt need not make any excuse for not having returned the papers this day, as his punctuality is too well known to give any room for suspicion, and the good Chancellor is rather famous for loving delay; therefore it sits on the present occasion most justly on his shoulders. Considering he had the papers so long in his hands within these three weeks, I should not have supposed they would require a fresh perusal. Not having heard anything this day, I should suppose that no inconvenience can arise from not hearing from Mr. Pitt on this subject till to-morrow. G. R.

April 19, 1785.

Mr. Pitt's note contains so many speakers on the question that he proposed yesterday in the House of Commons, that I am not surprised the debate continued to so late an hour; I trust the adjournment till to-morrow will make him not the worse for the fatigue that it must have occasioned. I understand that Lord Camden, who never before heard Mr. Pitt in Parliament, expressed at the Ancient Concert last night great commendation at his masterly performance.

Windsor, August 7, 1785.

I have this instant received Mr. Pitt's letter enclosing the one brought him by Count Woronzow's secretary and the paper that accompanied it, which is a copy of the one given on Friday to Lord Carmarthen. Count Woronzow also visited Lord Sydney and insisted a council was to be held the next day to give him an answer whether I would break the treaty I have in my Electoral capacity finally concluded with the King of Prussia and the Elector of Saxony to prevent all measures contrary to the Germanic Constitution. If no one has such dangerous views, this association cannot give umbrage; but the time certainly required this precaution. My only difficulty in giving any answer to the Empress of Russia is that her declaration bears so strongly the shape of a command that it requires a strong one.

St. James's, August 10, 1785.

On arriving in town I have received the three papers I proposed transmitting to Mr. Pitt. I cannot say that the time that has elapsed since last I wrote has diminished my surprise or cooled my feelings on the haughty step the Empress of Russia has taken; but I trust I have too much regard to my own dignity to wish any heat should appear in the answer that may next week be given to Count Woronzow, though she must know that when steps are taken from principle they are not to be retrograded. G. R.

February 28, 1786.

Mr. Pitt's moving an approbation of the plan of fortifications previous to the Speaker's leaving the Chair was undoubtedly the most likely method of gaining consent to the measure; but the postponing the consideration from last Session to this, though it arose from candour, had the appearance of avoiding the decision, and certainly gave time to the enemies of the fortifications to gain more strength. I do not in the least look on the event as any want of confidence in Mr. Pitt from the Members of the House of Commons, but their attachment to old prejudices and some disinclination to the projector of the fortifications. G. R.

March 30, 1786.

Considering Mr. Pitt has had the unpleasant office of providing for the expenses incurred by the last war, it is but just he should have the full merit he deserves of having the public know and feel that he has now proposed a measure that will render the nation again respectable, if she has the sense to remain quiet some years, and not by wanting to take a showy part in the transactions of Europe again become the dupe of other Powers, and from ideal greatness draw herself into lasting distress. The old English saying is applicable to our situation : 'England must cut her coat according to her cloth.'

June 14, 1786.

Mr. Pitt would have conducted himself yesterday very unlike what my mind ever expects of him if, as he thinks Mr. Hastings's conduct towards the Rajah was too severe, he had not taken the part he did, though it made him coincide with (the) adverse party. As to myself, I own I do not think it possible in that country to carry on business with the same moderation that is suitable to an European civilized nation. G. R.

Windsor, July 3, 1786.

The draft of a message to the Prince of Wales which Mr. Pitt sent to me on Saturday evening met so thoroughly with my ideas, that I have verbatim copied it, and sent it through the channel of Lord Southampton.

I return also the two letters from Mendiola, and approve the disclaiming in the strongest manner all idea of interfering in the discontents of the inhabitants of the Spanish settlements in South America. As I ever thought the conduct of France in North America unjustifiable, I certainly can never copy so faithless an example. G. R.

Mr. Pitt to the King.

January 22, 1787.

Mr. Pitt humbly begs leave to acquaint your Majesty that he has seen the Bishop of Peterborough, who wishes to decline the Deanery of St. Paul's, appearing at the same time very thankful for the offer, and begging to be laid at your Majesty's feet with every expression of duty and gratitude. Under these circumstances Mr. Pitt takes the liberty to submit to your Majesty his earnest wish that the Deanery of St. Paul's may still be held with the Bishopric of Lincoln, on Dr. Pretyman's giving up his prebend and living. As the preferment was held with two others in addition to it by the present Bishop, Mr. Pitt flatters himself there can be nothing objectionable in its being now given with the Bishopric, and he sees neither any arrangement of importance nor any pressing claim with which it can interfere.

Mr. Pitt will only presume to add that he can request nothing from your Majesty's goodness which he has more anxiously and personally at heart.

January 22, 1787.

Mr. Pitt, By your note, which met me as I was riding to town, I find the Bishop of Peterborough declines the Deanery of St. Paul's, and that this has made you renew your application for Dr. Pretyman. I see you have it so much at heart that I cannot let my reason guide me against my inclination to oblige you. I therefore consent to his having this Deanery with the Bishopric of Lincoln, though I am confident it will be, by all but those concerned, thought very unreasonable, and I should fear will serve as a precedent to the like applications. While desires increase, the means of satisfying people have been much diminished. G. R.

May 26, 1787.

Had Lord Carmarthen's letter, accompanied by a Minute of Cabinet, not been also by Mr. Pitt's letter, I should certainly have declined consenting to risk the advancing 70,000*l.* to the Stadtholder's party in the United Provinces; and though I now reluctantly consent to it from the fatal experience of having fed the Corsican cause, and Ministry never having, as they had promised, found means of its being refunded to me, which made me consequently afterwards appear in an extravagant light to Parliament, yet I trust to Mr. Pitt's honour that he will take such arrangements on this occasion as shall prevent postponing the regular payments of the Civil List, and that Parliament shall make good the payment the next winter without supposing that the demand arises from any extravagance on my part. G. R.

July 17, 1787.

My reason for suggesting the idea that though the King of Prussia can never coincide with the Emperor's views in Germany, they might agree as to the Netherlands, arose from thinking that in politics as well as private life, when nothing but what is fair is meant, it obviates suspicion to speak clearly, and that less openness often causes mischief.

October 12, 1787.

I cannot return to the Secretary of State's Office the very material papers on the plans of France with regard to India without sending Mr. Pitt a few lines. I should hope he will acquaint the Cabinet to-morrow that I am forming four regiments for that service, and that he will push on a negotiation with M. Boers to make the two Companies understand one another, and take efficient measures to secure us against our insidious neighbour. Perhaps no part of the change in Holland is so material to this country as the gaining that Republic as an ally in India. I recommend that no time should be lost in bringing this to bear, and our Company ought to be liberal in its offers to effect it. G. R.

March 6, 1788.

I have delayed acknowledging the receipt of Mr. Pitt's note informing me of the division in the House of Commons this morning, lest he might have been disturbed when it would have been highly inconvenient. It is amazing how, on a subject that could be reduced into so small a compass, the House would hear such long speaking. The object of Opposition was evidently to oblige the old and infirm Members to give up the attendance, which is reason sufficient for the friends of Government to speak merely to the point in future, and try to shorten debates, and bring, if possible, the present bad mode of mechanical oratory into discredit. G. R.

March 8, 1788.

Mr. Pitt having had so long an attendance again yesterday in the House of Commons, I did not choose to acknowledge the receipt of his note this morning. I am sure Mr. Pitt has acted very properly in proposing the recommitment of the Explanatory Bill, that a clause may be added disclaiming any view of patronage; but I cannot call those gentlemen sincere friends that have harboured unjust suspicions on that head. I fear it is come of the leaven of former Oppositions, who now support Government, but are not void of sentiments more calculated for their former than present line of conduct. I own I am not quite cool on this subject; for where suggestions are unfounded, they cannot be the offspring of real friends. G. R.

June 5, 1788.

I shall not object to advancing Sir James Harris to a seat in the House of Lords, provided he is accompanied by Sir Joseph Yorke. For though the latter may not have the same claim to favour from Administration, he certainly has it for forty years from the fountain of honour. If I do not remember past service, and only think of the moment, I shall not act the part I ought, which is the remembering that justice is the first duty of a Sovereign. Had not Sir James been recommended, I should not have thought of Sir Joseph; but the favour to the one makes the other indispensable, though never solicited. G. R.

Kew, June 12, 1788.

A pretty smart bilious attack prevents my coming this day to town. I am certainly better than yesterday, and if it goes on mending this day, I shall hope to see Mr. Pitt in town to-morrow. Sir George Baker approves of what I have done, and I trust his advice will remove the remains of this complaint. On returning from the review I was forced to take to my bed, as the only tolerable posture I could find. To be sure I am what one calls a cup too low, but when thoroughly cleared I hope to feel fully equal to any business that may occur.

Kew, June 12, 1788.

Since writing this morning I have seen Sir George Baker, who, though he thinks everything goes on well, yet very fairly told me that quiet is essential to removing my complaint, and that I must neither go to London to-morrow nor return to Windsor. I therefore give this information to Mr.

Pitt, that he may not think my not appearing to-morrow a sign of being worse. I certainly mend, but have been pretty well disciplined this day. I am sorry the Chancellor has not quite removed the trouble he has excited in the Law arrangements: it is melancholy that superior characters now and then let temper instead of reason guide them; but I trust Mr. Pitt's good temper will make him feel for weakness, and as the proposed arrangement will be effected, not feel for the manner. G. R.

I am this instant returned from seeing the most beautiful sight I ever beheld, namely, the clothing country near Stroud: above forty thousand people were assembled, and they all confess the trade is now brisker than the oldest person ever remembers.

Friday the 22nd is the first Levee, and consequently the proper time for Lord Amherst and Lord Howard to kiss hands. I hope I shall see Mr. Pitt in good health on the evening of the 19th at Windsor. G. R.

Kew, October 20, 1788, Six o'clock P.M.

I have not been able to answer Mr. Pitt's letter sooner this day, having had a very indifferent night; but the medicine which Sir George Baker found necessary to be taken to remove the spasm has now greatly relieved me. Indeed I think myself nearer getting rid of my complaint than since the attack. If I should have a good night, I will write and desire Mr. Pitt to come here previous to the meeting of the Cabinet.

We happily got through the business last year, but then our enemy was weak indeed, and the Prussian arms succeeded beyond expectation. In the present scene it is the contrary. The King of Sweden seems to have what often go together—great want of courage, and as little good faith. The sentiments of his subjects are not known here; for Mr. Elliot's despatches are, I believe, yet to be composed, and the Danish troops have advanced much farther than any one supposed; even Bernsdorf owns it in a letter I believe drawn up for our inspection. All I mean by this is, that we must try to save Sweden from becoming a province of Russia; but I do not think this object can only be obtained by a general war, to run the risk of ruining the finances of this country, which, if our pride will allow us to be quiet for a few years, will be in a situation to hold a language which does not become the having been driven out of America.

To speak openly, it is not the being considerably weakened by illness, but the feelings that never have day or night been at ease since this country took that disgraceful step, that has made me wish what years I have still to reign not to be drawn into a war. I am now within a few days of twenty-eight years, having been not on a bed of roses. I began with a successful war; the people grew tired of that, and called out for peace. Since that the most justifiable war any country ever waged—there in few campaigns, from being popular again peace was called for. After such woful examples, I must be a second Don Quixote if I did not wish, if possible, [to avoid] falling again into the same situation. The ardour of youth may not admire my calmness, but I think it fairer to speak out thus early than by silence be supposed to have changed my opinion, if things should bear a more warlike appearance than I now expect, and if I should then object to a general war.

I am afraid Mr. Pitt will perceive I am not quite in a situation to write at present, but I thought it better even to write as loosely as I have here than to let the box return without an answer to his letter. G. R.

Kew, Oct. 25, 1788.

Mr. Pitt really seemed distressed at seeing my bodily stiffness yesterday, which I alone exhibited to stop further lies and any fall of the Stocks. For this kindness I shall desire Sir George Baker (who is to call here previous to my setting out for Windsor this morning) on his return to town to call in Downing Street, that if Mr. Pitt is at leisure he may know exactly how Sir George found me.

I am certainly weak and stiff, but no wonder. I am certain air and relaxation are the quickest restoratives. But that nothing may be delayed by my present situation, I authorise Mr. Pitt to acquaint the Cabinet that though I can never think whether Sweden is governed by a corrupt King or a corrupt Senate a subject worthy risking the being drawn into a war, yet that if they wish to hold any language (that is never meant to be followed up to these dreadful lengths) which may perhaps tend to keep Sweden in its present situation, I do not object to it.

Mr. Pitt is desired by me to acknowledge the receipt of this, and to prevent all political papers being sent to me till I meet him on Wednesday at St. James's. G. R.

Mr. Pitt to the King.

Downing Street, Oct. 25, 1788, 5½ P.M.

Mr. Pitt did not receive your Majesty's commands till after his arrival in town, having missed the messenger in his way from the country; and he has since deferred acknowledging them, thinking it would be more satisfactory to write after the Cabinet.

Wishing to trespass as little as possible on your Majesty's time, he will only say that, notwithstanding the general opinion which he ventured to submit to your Majesty on the present state of affairs in the North, there seems no absolute necessity to say anything in the despatches now to be sent which could finally commit this country to the extent of going to war in support of Sweden, and that the instructions to Mr. Ewart will be framed on this idea.

Mr. Pitt feels as he ought your Majesty's condescension and goodness in giving him an opportunity of receiving a particular account from Sir George Baker, and from his statement flatters himself that a few days will remove the effects of your Majesty's complaint.

Windsor, November 3, 1788.

The King thinks it must give Mr. Pitt pleasure to receive a line from him. This will convince him the King can sign warrants without inconvenience: therefore he desires any that are ready may be sent, and he has no objection to receive any large number, for he shall order the messenger to return to town and shall sign them at his leisure. He attempts reading the despatches daily, but as yet without success; but he eats well, sleeps well, and is not in the least now fatigued with riding, though he cannot yet stand long, and is fatigued if he walks. Having gained so much, the rest will soon follow. Mr. Pitt is desired to be at Kew at two or three o'clock, whichever suits him best. G. R.[1]

[1] The letters of Oct. 25 and Nov. 3, 1788, here given entire, are the two last addressed by the King to Mr. Pitt previous to his great illness; and the correspondence was not renewed till Feb. 23, 1789.

Kew, Feb. 23, 1789.

It is with infinite satisfaction I renew my correspondence with Mr. Pitt by acquainting him of my having seen the Prince of Wales and my second son. Care was taken that the conversation should be general and cordial: they seemed perfectly satisfied. I chose the meeting should be in the Queen's apartment, that all parties might have that caution which at the present hour could but be judicious.

I desire Mr. Pitt will confer with the Lord Chancellor, that any steps which may be necessary for raising the annual supplies, or any measures that the interests of the nation may require, should not be unnecessarily delayed; for I feel the warmest gratitude for the support and anxiety shown by the nation at large during my tedious illness, which I should ill requite if I did not wish to prevent any further delay in those public measures which it may be necessary to bring forward this year, though I must decline entering into a pressure of business, and indeed for the rest of my life shall expect others to fulfil the duties of their employments, and only keep that superintending eye which can be effected without labour or fatigue.

I am anxious to see Mr. Pitt any hour that may suit him to-morrow morning, as his constant attachment to my interest and that of the public, which are inseparable, must ever place him in the most advantageous light. G. R.

Kew, March 10, 1789.

Mr. Pitt's account of the unanimity on the proposed Address is very consonant to what I expected. I have received from Lord Sydney the emptiest answer to the one to be presented to-morrow by the Lords with White Staves, [so] that I must put down words more agreeable to my feelings on the warm and steady support I have met with during my severe and tedious illness. I trust Mr. Pitt, who is fortunate in putting his thoughts on paper, will be attentive in forming the one I am to return to the Privy Councillors on Thursday for the House of Commons. I desire Lord Courtown may be appointed to attend with it on Thursday at half-past one. G. R.

April 12, 1789.

I am very sorry Mr. Pitt returns to a theme that has ever given me personal uneasiness. The conduct of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in the whole business of Colonel Gwynn was so perfectly inattentive, if not personally disrespectful to me, as well as contrary to every idea of what he particularly should have done considering his base conduct in 1784, that I certainly cannot easily forget it. The vacancy now occasioned arises from removing Colonel Gwynn to the British establishment: therefore it is but reasonable that it should open for advancement in this service. The utmost I can do out of attention to Mr. Pitt, not Lord Buckingham, is not to hurry the conclusion of the business, though thoroughly determined not to yield to my deputy in Ireland.

Kew, April 16, 1789.

Mr. Pitt may rely on my delaying any appointments to the vacancies occasioned by the death of Lieutenant-General Mackay, that I may see if any arrangement can be found that may be of any use in the present state of things. I certainly meant to delay the vacancy occasioned by the removal of Lieutenant-Colonel Gwynn if Major Taylor continued to decline; but after all I had done, it was impossible I could delay it when he on better consideration accepted. To say the truth, though I am recovering, my mind is not strong enough as yet to stand little ruffles, and still more so when they relate to Lord Buckingham, who does not stand well in my mind.

I shall return to-morrow morning to Windsor; but if Mr. Pitt can call here before ten, I shall certainly gladly see him. G. R.

Windsor, April 21, 1789.

The despatch of the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland on the intended resignation of the Lord Chancellor of that kingdom is a matter of too much consequence and requires too much deliberation for me to wish to keep it unnecessarily from the inspection of the Lord Chancellor and of Mr. Pitt. Besides, I must candidly confess that though now without complaint, I feel more strongly the effects of my late severe and tedious illness than I had expected; though but what had been insinuated, I mean a certain lassitude and want of energy both of mind and body, which must require time, relaxation, and change of scene to restore any energy. Indeed I have, among other blessings, the advantage of having in the Lord Chancellor and Mr. Pitt two men thoroughly fit to conduct the business of their two Houses of Parliament, whose attachment to my person and to the true constitution of this realm is undoubted, and who must see the necessity to my ease as well as the real stability of the State requires their cordially acting together, and they must acknowledge the utility of early conferring together on matters of importance, that their opinions may be as it were mutually formed, and that no difficulties may arise from having separately arranged their opinions.

I see the evil of appointing an Irishman in a more forcible degree now than when England had a proper lead over Ireland, but I really have not at present a vigour of mind to discuss the question. Therefore I rest secure on their giving it all the consideration the question requires, and should hope they would also confer with Lords Camden and Stafford, after which it will be right to take the opinion of the Cabinet.

I trust this candid explanation of my sentiments to Mr. Pitt, which he should communicate to the Lord Chancellor, will be a proof to them that the public service is ever in my mind, and that as an honest man when unable to act I am desirous of deriving assistance from those who are incapable of separating interests that must and ever shall be whilst I live the same. G. R.

Windsor, May 5, 1789.

I have just received Mr. Pitt's letter. Before I can give him any directions for fixing the allowance on William, I must see Colonel Hotham, to know the exact state of the sum that jointly regards those attendants and servants that belonged jointly to him and Edward. In truth the lassitude and dejection that has accompanied me since free from all fever prevents my being able to decide either quickly or satisfactorily to myself on any subject, and consequently makes me require time on all matters that come before me.

G. R.

Weymouth, July 30, 1789.

I perfectly approve of the mode proposed by Mr. Pitt of filling up the vacant offices, and am glad Mr. Hopkins remains at the Admiralty Board, where he is certainly a useful member. The patents of Marquises should also be prepared for Lords Salisbury and Weymouth, and the Earldom for Lord Fortescue. Might this not also be a good opportunity for indulging Lord Mount Edgcumbe with a similar promotion? G. R.

Exeter, Aug. 27, 1789.

The warrants in favour of Dr. Willis and his son I have signed, and think this the proper time of mentioning to Mr. Pitt Mr. Thomas Willis, who certainly has the most merit in having supported the old Doctor through his difficulties with the other physicians. What seems the natural provision for him is the first vacant prebendary of Worcester. I have seen so much of him that I can answer for his principles being such as will do credit to my patronizing him. The warrant for the other physicians seems very large, considering their conduct; but I will not enter on a subject that cannot but give me pain, for I cannot say I find myself either in strength or spirits so much recruited as I should have hoped. G. R.

Windsor, Nov. 24, 1789.

The last evening I received an answer from the Chancellor to the letter I had wrote to him. It is so very proper, that I cannot help giving this information to Mr. Pitt, though I shall to-morrow show him the copy of my letter as well as this very handsome answer. I have not the smallest degree of doubt but that, with the mutual desire of acting agreeable to my wishes, I shall have the satisfaction of seeing you both much more cordial than at any time since you have been together in Ministry. The good of the whole must be the real object to fill both your minds; and little differences, whether occasioned by want of temper or by inadvertencies, must be forgot as unworthy of notice where such superior causes ought alone to deserve the attention of exalted minds.
G. R.

Windsor, May 17, 1790.

I have just received the two copies of the messages to the Houses of Parliament for granting the pension to Dr. Willis, and have signed them. I should imagine Lord Auckland's name would not come forward in so agreeable a manner, and therefore do not object to Mr. Pitt's offering the reversion of the Tellership of the Exchequer, become vacant by the death of Lord Hardwicke. Had Mr. Pitt proposed some means of rendering it of utility to himself, it would have been pleasing to me, as I do not feel easy at not having had an opportunity of securing a provision for him in case of my paying that tribute to which every one is sooner or later subject.

G. R.

Windsor, Nov. 21, 1790.

I have carefully perused the correspondence, transmitted to me this morning, which has arisen on a vacant office in Scotland, and which certainly shows that the Chancellor's temper actuates him more than the goodness of his heart and of his head should permit. But an experience of thirty years convinces me that in most men the former too frequently has the advantage.

Mr. Pitt's account of the conversation that has since been held by the Chancellor with Mr. Dundas, is a proof that he is open to join cordially (which I look upon as essential to the public service), provided the old complaint on the subject of Mr. Rose could be removed. Mr. Pitt must do me the justice to recollect, that though I look on this as a very difficult point, yet that I have declared myself ever ready to contribute towards removing it, if any means can be pointed out.

My sentiments can be conveyed on the whole of this matter in a few words. The state of the House of Lords is such that Opposition have many speakers, and on the side of Government only the Lord Chancellor and Lord Hawkesbury; for the Chief Justice, though a worthy man and able lawyer, does not succeed as a debater. This shows how necessary it is to remove every cause of misunderstanding with the Chancellor, who is certainly to be gained by affection. With all his appearance of roughness, he has a feeling heart, and that alone can guide him in contradiction to his temper. Lord Stafford, if he will heartily engage to talk with the Chancellor, can certainly do much good, and should point out to him that the promise of support given to me last Session is not acted up to, if he brings up the subject of Mr. Rose.

Though I think the House of Peers is certainly becoming too numerous, which, I fear, will be found rather inconvenient, yet it is impossible for me to object to removing

Mr. Grenville to that House; as his abilities will be of material use, and his conciliating temper will in future aid in keeping matters smooth with the Chancellor.

G. R.

Dec. 12, 1790.

Having summoned a Chapter of the Garter for Wednesday, and Mr. Pitt not having been at St. James's in the course of the last week, I think it necessary by this means to remind him of my having offered him one of the vacancies of that Order. When last I mentioned it, he seemed to decline it; but perhaps the conclusion of the dispute with Spain may make him see it in a different view, namely, as a public testimonial of my approbation.

Dec. 13, 1790.

I have just received Mr. Pitt's letter declining my offer of one of the vacant Garters, but in so handsome a manner that I cannot help expressing my sensibility.

Dec. 14, 1790.

Mr. Pitt's note is just arrived, intimating a wish that I would confer the third vacant Garter on his brother Lord Chatham. I trust he is too well convinced of my sentiments to doubt that I with pleasure shall to-morrow give this public testimony of approbation, which will be understood as meant to the whole family.

Feb. 22, 1791.

The situation Mr. Ryder holds, and the part he takes in debate, seem to give him very fair pretensions for being advanced with Mr. Steele to joint Paymasters. I approve of their vacating to-morrow their seats, and desire Mr. Pitt will take the necessary steps for that purpose. G. R.

April 23, 1791.

The Duke of Leeds having delivered up the Seals of his office on Thursday, I have deposited them with Lord Grenville, so that Mr. Pitt may calmly weigh how the office of Secretary of State can best be filled. I own I think Lord Grenville has a claim to change departments if agreeable to him, and it may be easier to find one for the Home than for the Foreign Department. Having said thus much, I leave it to Mr. Pitt maturely to weigh the subject, as I do not intend to come to town during the next week, and the new Secretary cannot be sworn in till the following. G. R.

May 1, 1792.

The most daring outrage to a regular Government committed by the new Society, which yesterday published its Manifesto in several of the newspapers, could only be equalled by some of its leaders standing forth the same day to avow their similar sentiments in the House of Commons; and I cannot see any substantial difference in their being joined in debate by Mr. Fox, and his not being a member of that Society.

I received last night the enclosed paper from the Duke of Gloucester; it is drawn up by the same pen from which intelligence was sent on Saturday by Lord Sydney to Mr. Dundas. It deserves the attention of administration; and it seems highly worthy of inquiry whether any large sum of money has been procured for France from Ireland, and whether Irishmen are connected with the French emissaries in this country.

May 15, 1792, 6.31 P.M.

Mr. Secretary Dundas has acted very properly in postponing the publishing an extraordinary Gazette, if there is the smallest doubt of the authenticity of the news he received this day; but I own I cannot willingly give up crediting the good account. If it is a forgery, it has been ably conducted.

I trust he will follow up the idea of showing Mr. Pitt that he has a real victory over the Chancellor if he keeps his temper, and that my service requires his resisting any warmth, and that however improper the language may have been, public reasons ought to prevent his taking any step; though I think Mr. Secretary Dundas ought to speak some truth to the Chancellor on this occasion, and point out how much his conduct on this occasion, if such as has been stated, is detrimental to my affairs and those of the nation. I cannot but think that the Chancellor must be ready to own that it is unbecoming in the highest degree to be wasting the present hour in personal disputes, and I trust an explanation will be made that will heal any present uneasiness.

Aug. 6, 1792.

Having this morning received the account of the death of the Earl of Guilford, I take the first opportunity of acquainting Mr. Pitt that the Wardenship of the Cinque

Ports is an office for which I will not receive any recommendations, having positively resolved to confer it on him as a mark of that regard which his eminent services have deserved from me. I am so bent on this, that I shall seriously be offended at any attempt to decline. I have intimated these my intentions to the Earl of Chatham, Lord Grenville, and Mr. Dundas.

As to the Lieutenancy of Somersetshire, the very steady support of the Earl of Paulett, added to its having been usually entrusted to his ancestors, makes me think he can have no just competitor; and as he is in the neighbourhood of Burton, Mr. Pitt's acquainting him that it has been spontaneously conferred upon him will not be thrown away.

G. R.

Windsor, Nov. 26, 1792.

Mr. Pitt's letter is just arrived, enclosing that and the postscript he received from Lord Loughborough. I cannot help stating some ideas to which they have given rise. The tenor of these papers, and of the explanatory conversation, confirm me in the belief that Lord Loughborough is disappointed the party have not permitted him to accept the situation proposed for him, and I fairly hope, therefore, that he will both in the House of Commons, and on particular cases, where his opinion as a counsellor may be required, give his genuine sentiments; but I think it shows the Duke of Portland and his advisers are much less fixed in their resolution to support than the imagination of Mr. Burke, or the more systematical judgment of Mr. Windham, gave reason to expect.
